Preface to the Second Revised Edition

The first edition to this Commentary was written during the early years of Manfred Nowak's term as UN Special Rapporteur on Torture, i.e. between 2004 and 2006. Thanks to the financial support of the Governments of Austria, Switzerland, Liechtenstein and Germany, he was able to establish an "anti-torture team" of highly skilled and dedicated researchers at the Ludwig Boltzmann Institute of Human Rights (BIM), which was founded by Manfred Nowak and Hannes Tretter in 1992 and directed by them jointly since then. Elizabeth McArthur was employed at the BIM as the lead researcher for the Commentary with funds provided by the Austrian Science Fund (FWF). The website www.atlas-of-torture.org was established to document and promote the work of the Special Rapporteur and observe the worldwide situation of torture and ill-treatment. In addition, Manfred Nowak had served since 2000 as head of a visiting commission to all places of police detention in Austria, established as part of the Human Rights Advisory Board in the Ministry of Interior. In this task, he was also supported by members of the "anti-torture team" at the BIM. These practical experiences and the theoretical research on the Commentary complemented each other in the most productive and fruitful manner. Besides Elizabeth McArthur also Julia Kozma, Roland Schmidt and Isabelle Tschan, who prepared and carried out many missions and reports of the Special Rapporteur, as well as Kerstin Buchinger participated in the academic research work for the Commentary. In other words, the first edition, although finally authored by Manfred Nowak and Elizabeth McArthur, was a joint product of many researchers and practitioners at BIM.

The mandate of Manfred Nowak as UN Special Rapporteur on Torture came to an end in October 2010. However, the torture-related work of the BIM continued. The "anti-torture team" had grown into the Department of "Human Dignity and Public Security" and is currently led by Moritz Birk, who was already part of the Special Rapporteur's team. The Special Rapporteur's work was followed up by a three-year project - financed by the European Union and in partnership with local civil society organisations - to assist a group of selected States (Moldova, Paraguay, Togo and Uruguay) in the implementation of the Special Rapporteur's recommendations. Manfred Nowak continued to serve as head of a visiting commission monitoring the Austrian police, which was in 2012 transferred to the Austrian Ombuds-Board, which assumed the function of National Preventive Mechanism (NPM) in accordance with OPCAT. The researchers at the BIM provided their services to two visiting commissions and thereby gained also significant experience with the practice of an NPM. The diverse experiences were used in a variety of other projects of applied research and practical assistance to States notably to support the establishment and functioning of NPMs. The different projects to fight torture and ill-treatment worldwide and promote human rights in the criminal justice system by the Department can be accessed on the Institutes' website: <https://bim.lbg.ac.at/en/human-dignity-and-public-security>.

When we decided, again upon request of Oxford University Press and with the generous financial support of the Austrian Science Fund (FWF), to prepare a second edition of the Commentary, it was clear that this would have to become a truly joint endeavour of the “Human Dignity and Public Security” Department at the BIM, based upon our joint research and broad practical experience. Manfred Nowak, Moritz Birk and Giuliana Monina serve as joint editors, but the different Articles of the Convention against Torture (CAT) and its Optional Protocol (OPCAT) are written under the individual responsibility of a variety of highly experienced authors, who are either current or former staff of the Ludwig Boltzmann Institute of Human Rights: Moritz Birk, Giuliana Monina, Nora Katona, Margit Ammer, Kerstin Buchinger, Stephanie Krisper, Johanna Lober, Roland Schmidt, Andrea Schüchner, and Gerrit Zach.

The ten-year interval since the first edition has seen several important developments in the field. There has been a considerable change in the ratification status of both the Convention and its Optional Protocol, with 162 States having ratified the CAT and 88 States having ratified the OPCAT.

Since 2008, the CAT Committee has adopted three new General Comments; more than 200 new individual complaints covering all substantial articles; new rules of procedure as well as conducted four new inquiry procedures under Article 20 CAT (in Egypt, Lebanon, Nepal and Brazil). In the framework of the treaty body strengthening process, it has developed various measures aimed at improving the States parties’ compliance with their Convention obligations, above a simplified reporting procedure to guide States parties in their reporting duties; a procedure on follow-up to concluding observations, individual complaints and inquiry procedure to better monitor the implementation of its recommendations; and a mechanism to prevent, monitor and follow-up cases of intimidations and reprisals against civil society organizations, human rights defenders, victims and witnesses that engage and cooperate with the Committee.

In relation to the Optional Protocol, the first edition of this Commentary was published at a time when the SPT was not yet operational, thus, it relied primarily on the practice of the European Committee for the Prevention of Torture (CPT). The second edition contains a detailed analysis of the initial ten years of work of the SPT taking into account the work of National Preventive Mechanisms (NPMs).

To reflect these changes and developments this edition has been substantially revised. As the earlier version, it attempts to be an in-depth analysis of all substantive, organizational and procedural provisions of the Convention against Torture and its Optional Protocol and wants to ensure that the Commentary continues to serve as a comprehensive guide for researchers and practitioners alike. For that purpose, it was attempted to make the manuscript more user friendly by modifying the original structure merging the practice of the Committee with the analysis of the issues of interpretation, thereby trying to avoid repetitions and providing a more concise analysis. The structural changes and the significant developments in the jurisprudence and practice of the two treaty bodies required considerable revision, re-organisation and expansion of many Articles. Other Articles, however, required only minor updates and build more strongly on the text of the first edition authored by Manfred Nowak and Elisabeth McArthur (ie Articles 8, 9, 10, 17, 18, 23-27, 29, and 31-33 CAT). Moreover, the second edition leaves untouched the thorough analysis of the travaux préparatoires of the Convention and its Optional Protocol in the Commission on Human Rights and its inter-sessional Working Group already drafted by the authors of the first edition.

We wish to express our sincere gratitude to many individuals who provided us with information and advice during our research work, above all Patrice Gilbert from the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights in Geneva, Jens Modvig, Chair of the UN Committee against Torture and Malcom Evans, Chair of the SPT, as well as all the members of the Committee against Torture who participated in a side meeting during the 62nd session in Geneva in November 2017 to discuss key issue of interpretation with the editors. We also extend our gratitude to Carin Benninger-Budel (OMCT), Barbara Bernath and Veronica Filippeschi (APT), Elina Steinerte (Bristol University) and Lutz Oette (SOAS University of London) for providing valuable comments on the drafts.

We are also deeply indebted to numerous research fellows and interns who conducted research on specific questions of interpretation and contributed in a most professional manner to the preparation of the Commentary. In this context, special thanks go to Elena Dietenberger and Miranda Merkviladze. We are also grateful to Laura Alberti, Samory Badona Monteiro, Aram Bajalan, Shimels S. Belete, Elisa Klein-Diaz, Nabila Ehrhardt, Katharina Heymann, Saskia Kaltenbrunner, Julia Kostal, Nicole Metz, Felix Steigmann. Finally, we wish to express our gratitude to Oxford University Press and, especially Natasha Flemming and Merel Alstein, who have always encouraged and patiently cooperated with us throughout the whole period, the Ludwig Boltzmann Institute of Human Rights in Vienna, home to fruitful exchanges and discussions that have ultimately flew into the pages of this Commentary and the FWF Austrian Science Fund whose generous support only made this publication possible.

The practice of the CAT Committee and the SPT was taken into account until 31 March 2017. Other key developments, such as the General Comment No. 4 adopted by the CAT Committee at the 62nd session from November/December 2017, have been taken into account by the authors up until the end of December 2017.

The first edition of this Commentary was written in the middle of the so-called “war on terror”, which had seriously undermined the universal consensus on the absolute prohibition of torture and other forms of ill-treatment. The “war on terror” seems to be over, but the practice of torture, cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment has certainly not improved since then. When he finished his activities as UN Special Rapporteur on Torture, which had included 18 official fact-finding missions to countries in all world regions, three joint investigations with other special procedures of the UN Human Rights Council and comprehensive research, Manfred Nowak concluded that torture is occurring in more than 90% of all States, is practiced routinely in more than 50% of all States and systematically in roughly 10%. In addition, he identified a global prison crisis and inhuman conditions of detention in the majority of States in all world regions.¹ The reports of his two successors in this mandate, Juan Mendez and Nils Melzer, show that the situation is unfortunately not improving. On the contrary, the erosion of the universal consensus on the absolute prohibition of torture has reached such an alarming level that persons have recently been elected as Presidents of powerful States in both the Global North and the Global South, who openly advocate torture. This illustrates that we would need a radical change in world politics if we wish to achieve the ultimate goal of eradicating the practice of torture, preventing the risk of torture and improving conditions of detention. We hope that this second edition of our Commentary on CAT and OPCAT may remind States of their legally binding obligations and provide useful insights on the measures that need to be taken to provide future generation with the right to live in freedom from fear, torture and similar forms of State violence.

1. The Phenomenon of Torture

Torture constitutes a direct and deliberate attack on the core of the human personality and dignity. As slavery, it aims at depriving human beings of their humanity. Slavery is defined in Article 1 of the Slavery Convention of 1926 as ‘the status or condition of a person over whom any or all of the powers attaching to the right of ownership are exercised’. While slavery deprives the victim ex lege of his or her status as a human being by allowing the slave owner to exercise unrestricted legal power over the victim, torture describes a situation in which one person exercises unrestricted factual power over another person. Slavery and torture, as the two most extreme forms of dehumanizing human beings by depriving them of human dignity, have more in common than one would expect at the outset. In ancient Greek and Roman times, for example, witness testimony of slaves in civil or criminal proceedings was only admitted if confirmed under torture. This relationship between slavery, torture, and the right to human dignity is best expressed in Article 5 of the African Charter of Human and Peoples’ Rights (ACHPR).¹

The powerlessness of the victim, which in our opinion constitutes one of the essential definitional criteria of torture,² is illustrated by many of the typical methods of torture, including short-shackling, suspension in painful positions such as ‘strapado’ or ‘Palestinian hanging’, stripping victims naked and subjecting them to various forms of beatings, electric shocks, rape, and other sexual assaults, repeated immersion into water while being fixed on a board (‘water boarding’) or into a mixture of blood, urine, vomit, and excrement (‘submarino’), simulated executions or amputations. Such a situation of absolute power and control over the victim usually means that the victim is detained and held behind closed doors. If the victim is held incommunicado in a secret place of detention, without any contact with the outside world, the feeling of being isolated, frightened, powerless, and subject to the unrestricted power of the torturer is indeed most extreme. Torture aims at breaking the will of the victim in order to achieve a certain purpose, such as extracting a confession or other relevant information.

¹ Art 5 ACHPR reads as follows: ‘Every individual shall have the right to the respect of the dignity inherent in a human being and to the recognition of his legal status. All forms of exploitation and degradation of man particularly slavery, slave trade, torture, cruel, inhuman or degrading punishment and treatment shall be prohibited.’

Torture was practised by many peoples and in various cultures during different historical periods.³ Particular brutal and well documented examples were the practices of torture against slaves and Christians during Roman times, against criminal suspects during the Middle Ages, against witches by the Roman Catholic inquisition in Europe, against African slaves in the American hemisphere, and against peoples under colonial domination of European powers in Africa, Asia, and Latin America. Although torture, as slavery, was legally abolished in Europe and the American hemisphere during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries as a result of the age of Enlightenment, natural law, humanism, and rationalism, it continued to exist or re-appeared in practice. Most notorious were the systematic and extremely cruel practices of torture under the totalitarian regimes of Stalinism and National Socialism before and during World War II.

With the development of international human rights law after World War II, the prohibition of slavery (as well as slave trade and servitude) and torture (as well as cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment) soon emerged as two human rights which were formulated as absolute and non-derogable rights, even in times of war, terrorism, and similar public emergencies threatening the life of the nation. The absolute prohibition of torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment can be found, for instance, in Article 5 UDHR 1948, common Article 3 of the four Geneva Conventions on Humanitarian Law 1949, Article 3 (together with 15) ECHR 1950, the UN Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners 1955 (and the revised ‘Mandela Rules’ of 2015), Article 7 (together with 4) CCPR 1966, Article 5 (together with 27) ACHR 1969 and Article 5 ACHPR.

Nevertheless, torture continued to be systematically practised in many parts of the world. Well-known and documented cases during the 1960s and 1970s include the French practices in Algeria, the Portuguese practices in its former African colonies, the practices under the Greek military junta, and those under Latin American military dictatorships.⁴ Increasing reports of torture and massive ill-treatment from many parts of the world made Amnesty International (AI) launch a worldwide campaign against torture on Human Rights Day in 1972. Most notorious were the cruel methods of torture practised by the military junta under General Augusto Pinochet Ugarte, who had overthrown the democratically elected Government of Salvador Allende in Chile on 11 September 1973. The widely documented cases of torture and enforced disappearances in Chile turned out to be the starting point for a number of far-reaching measures and reforms in international human rights law. In November 1973, the UN General Assembly expressed serious concerns about these torture practices and put the question of torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment as a standing item on its agenda.⁵ In spring 1974, the Human Rights Commission, in a telegram addressed to the Chilean Government, expressed its concerns about torture which, at that time, constituted an unprecedented step that was still widely regarded as an undue interference with the domestic jurisdiction of States under Article 2(7) of the UN Charter. A year later the UN General Assembly adopted the Declaration on the Protection of All Persons from Being Subjected to Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, hereinafter referred to as ‘the Declaration’.⁶ This non-binding Declaration, based on a draft prepared during the Fifth UN Congress on Crime Prevention, already contained the use of criminal law for the prevention of torture.⁷ The adoption of the Declaration was the first step in the process of drafting a binding Convention against Torture and its text served as a model.

2. Drafting History, Entry into Force, and Status of Ratification of the Convention and Protocol

In December 1977, the General Assembly formally requested the Commission on Human Rights to draft the text of a binding Convention against Torture on the basis of the 1975 Declaration.⁸ When the Commission in February 1978 entrusted this task to an informal, inter-sessional Working Group,⁹ the International Association of Penal Law (IAPL) and the Swedish Government had already prepared draft texts with innovative ideas regarding international human rights law.

The IAPL Draft of 15 January 1978 put the focus on the obligation of States to criminalize torture and to bring the perpetrators to justice.¹⁰ Similar to the Genocide Convention of 1948 and the Apartheid Convention of 1973, it aimed at declaring torture a crime under international law. With respect to international monitoring, it envisaged a State reporting procedure before the Human Rights Committee, assisted by a Special Committee on the Prevention of Torture, and the possibility to bring disputes before the ICJ. The draft was only concerned with torture but not with cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.

The original Swedish Draft of 18 January 1978 closely followed the 1975 Declaration. It also focused on the criminalization of torture but proposed the principle of universal jurisdiction, in combination with the principle ‘aut dedere aut iudicare’, similar to earlier treaties against hostage-taking and other forms of terrorism.¹¹ In addition to obligations aimed at bringing individual perpetrators of torture to justice before domestic criminal courts, the Swedish Draft also contained a number of suggestions for the prevention of torture. With respect to international monitoring, it proposed to entrust the Human Rights Committee with special tasks of examining State reports, deciding on individual and inter-State complaints, as well as conducting ex officio inquiries. The Swedish Draft was chosen by the Working Group as the main basis for its deliberations.¹²

In 1980, Costa Rica proposed to the Human Rights Commission a draft for an Optional Protocol to the draft Convention against Torture which was based on the experiences of the ICRC and a private Swiss proposal of Jean-Jacques Gautier, a Geneva-based banker. The Costa Rica Draft, which was actively supported by the International Commission of Jurists and the Swiss Committee against Torture, aimed at introducing a system of preventive and unannounced visits to places of detention.¹³

Between 1978 and 1984, the inter-sessional Working Group of the Human Rights Commission under the chair of the Dutch diplomat Herman Burgers, despite strong ideological differences between the Western, Socialist, and other concepts of human rights, succeeded in finding a compromise on most of the controversial issues, including the principle of universal jurisdiction.¹⁴ Instead of entrusting the Human Rights Committee with the additional task of monitoring compliance with the CAT, the Working Group proposed to establish a Committee against Torture consisting of ten independent experts.

When the Human Rights Commission adopted the draft Convention of the Working Group in March 1984 and transmitted it to the General Assembly,¹⁵ only two controversial questions remained open: the competence of the Committee against Torture to issue country specific comments and suggestions in relation to State reports under Article 19 and the mandatory character of the inquiry procedure under Article 20 CAT.¹⁶ Since most States were eager to adopt the Convention quickly, Western States in the Third Committee of the General Assembly gave in to certain demands of Socialist States.¹⁷ The result is the 'opting-out clause' in Article 28 CAT and a highly ambiguous provision about 'general comments' on specific State reports in Article 19(3) CAT.¹⁸

With these compromises, the Convention against Torture was unanimously adopted by the UN General Assembly on 10 December 1984.¹⁹ When the Convention was opened for signature on 5 February 1985, a total of twenty States, including twelve member States of the Council of Europe, had already signed it. The Convention entered into force on 26 June 1987, exactly thirty days after the date of deposit of the twentieth instrument of ratification.²⁰ Since the required number of five optional declarations in accordance with Articles 21(2) and 22(8) CAT had already been achieved at an earlier stage, the individual and inter-State complaints procedures entered into force on 26 June 1987 as well.²¹ On 26 November 1987, the States parties to the Convention elected the first ten members of the Committee against Torture,²² which held its first session in Geneva from 18 to 22 April 1988.²³

As of 31 December 2017, the Convention against Torture has been ratified or acceded to by a total of 162 States from all regions of the world.²⁴ Of these 162 States parties, sixty-three have made the optional declaration under Article 21(1) recognizing the inter-State complaints procedure, and sixty-nine States parties have made the optional declaration under Article 22(1) recognizing the individual complaints procedure.²⁵ Since the adoption of the Convention, twenty-six States parties have availed themselves of the 'opting out' possibility under Article 28 in relation to the inquiry procedure under Article 20, some of which withdrew this reservation later. Presently, only fourteen of the 162 States have opted out, which means that a total of 148 States parties have in fact accepted this additional monitoring procedure.²⁶ Finally, thirty-three States parties have over time availed themselves of the 'opting out' possibility under Article 30(2) in relation to the dispute settlement procedure and the competence of the ICJ under Article 30(1), but again some have withdrawn their reservation, and presently there are twenty-four States parties that have opted out.²⁷

The Costa Rica draft Optional Protocol aimed at establishing a system of preventive visits to places of detention was not taken up during the drafting of the CAT. During the Cold War, the competence of an international monitoring body to carry out preventive and unannounced missions and visits to the territory of States parties was politically simply unacceptable and regarded as undue interference with State sovereignty. But the Council of Europe took up this idea of Jean-Jacques Gautier, actively supported by the Swiss Committee against Torture (which later became the Association for the Prevention of Torture (APT)) and the International Commission of Jurists, and adopted the European Convention for the Prevention of Torture (ECPT) in 1987.²⁸ After the entry into force of this innovative Convention on 1 February 1989, the European Committee for the Prevention of Torture (CPT) was established, consisting of one independent expert per State party (presently forty-seven), with the task of organizing missions to the territory of States parties, conducting unannounced visits to places of detention and carrying out private interviews with detainees. In practice, the missions and visits of the CPT and its reports to States parties with far-reaching recommendations have had a significant impact on improving conditions of detention and the treatment of detainees in most of the member States of the Council of Europe.²⁹

After the end of the Cold War, the UN Commission on Human Rights took up the idea of Jean-Jacques Gautier and entrusted another inter-sessional Working Group with the task of drafting an Optional Protocol to the CAT. The Working Group based its deliberations on a revised draft submitted by Costa Rica and was chaired by Elizabeth Odio Benito, former Minister of Justice of Costa Rica.³⁰ The highly controversial and political discussions between European and most Latin American States on the one hand, and a broad variety of other States on the other, concerning primarily issues of State sovereignty, blocked any significant progress during the 1990s. Only after Mexico had reacted on the European States' suggestion of a very strong SPT with a far-reaching mandate and introduced the idea of establishing domestic visiting commissions (so-called national preventive mechanisms)³¹ in addition to the international monitoring body (the UN Subcommittee on Prevention of Torture [SPT]),³² could a broad majority be formed to adopt the OP by majority vote.

The OP was adopted on 18 December 2002 in the General Assembly by a vote of 127 States in favour, four against and forty-two abstentions.³³ On 22 June 2006, ie thirty days after the date of deposit of the twentieth instrument of ratification, the OP entered into force.³⁴ On 18 December 2006, the States parties to the OP elected the first ten independent experts of the SPT,³⁵ which held its first session in Geneva from 19 to 23 February 2007.³⁶ As of 31 December 2017, a total of 84 States parties to CAT had ratified or acceded to the OP.³⁷

3. Content and Significance of the Convention and Protocol

The Convention against Torture was adopted in 1984 as a specialized human rights treaty in response to the widespread and systematic practice of torture in Latin America and other regions of the world. Since the prohibition of torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment has been recognized in Article 7 CCPR and other international and regional human rights treaties as an absolute and non-derogable human right and is also considered as jus cogens, the drafters of the Convention abstained from reiterating this principle. Rather, the Convention is based on the explicit desire of its drafters 'to make more effective the struggle against torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment throughout the world'.³⁸ This goal was achieved by three different types of measures: repression against individual perpetrators of torture by means of domestic criminal law and the principle of universal jurisdiction; recognition of the right of victims of torture to a remedy and adequate reparation; and comprehensive obligations of States parties to prevent torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. Although the term 'cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment' has not been defined and the different categories of ill-treatment not delineated,³⁹ Article 1 CAT is the first provision in international law which provides for a legal definition of torture which, nevertheless, is subject to controversial discussions in legal theory and practice.⁴⁰ Since most of the Convention's provisions, above all those related to the criminal responsibility of the perpetrators, only apply to torture and not to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, the legal distinction between torture and other forms of ill-treatment is significant.

Most preventive obligations of States parties equally apply to torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.⁴¹ In addition to the general obligation of States parties under Articles 2 and 16 to take effective legislative, administrative, judicial, or other measures to prevent torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment in any territory under their jurisdiction, States also have specific obligations to include the prohibition of torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment in the training curricula of law enforcement and prison personnel (Article 10), to keep interrogation rules and methods under systematic review (Article 11), and to carry out prompt and impartial ex officio investigations, wherever there is reasonable ground to believe that an act of torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment has been committed (Article 12). Since victims of torture are often too afraid or unable to lodge a complaint against their tormenters, this obligation of police chiefs, prison directors, public prosecutors, police and prison doctors, and others to start ex officio a thorough investigation before an independent body whenever they suspect that an act of torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment might have occurred, is of utmost importance for the prevention of torture. In addition, no confession or information extracted by torture shall be admitted as evidence in any judicial or administrative proceedings (Article 15). If the relevant authorities were to take the inadmissibility of torture tainted evidence seriously, a major incentive for extracting information and confessions through torture would disappear. Finally, States parties to the OP have an additional preventive obligation to establish one or several independent national preventive mechanisms with the power to carry out unannounced visits to all places of detention, to conduct private interviews with all detainees, and to make recommendations to the relevant authorities with the aim of preventing torture and improving conditions of detention (Articles 17–23 OP).

Another important provision for the prevention of torture is the principle of non-refoulement in Article 3 CAT. States are not only under an obligation to refrain from practising torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment by their own officials on their own territory, but they are also required to refrain from expelling, returning, or extraditing a person to another State where there are substantial grounds for believing that he or she would be in danger of being subjected to torture. Since many victims of torture flee their country and seek refuge in other countries, the principle of non-refoulement constitutes an important means of protecting vulnerable groups. If States were to respect this important principle properly, many cases of torture could be prevented. It is interesting to note that the vast majority of individual complaints under Article 22 CAT so far decided by the Committee against Torture relate to the principle of non-refoulement.⁴²

In addition to these measures aimed at preventing torture, a second category of State obligations relates to the right of victims of torture to a remedy and adequate reparation for the harm suffered. Article 13 provides that every victim of torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment has the right to complain to a competent domestic authority which shall promptly and impartially examine every allegation and ensure that victims and witnesses are adequately protected against intimidation and reprisals. If domestic remedies are not effective, Article 22 provides for the possibility for victims to submit an individual complaint against the State party concerned to the Committee against Torture. As mentioned above, this individual complaints procedure is, however, optional and only sixty-eight out of the 162 States parties to CAT have made the respective declaration in accordance with Article 22(1).⁴³ Victims of torture also have the right to adequate reparation for the harm suffered, which consists primarily of fair and adequate monetary compensation as well as medical, psychological, and other types of rehabilitation (Article 14).

The third category of State obligations relates to the use of domestic criminal law against perpetrators of torture and constitutes a special raison d'être for the entire Convention. First of all, States are under an obligation to ensure that all acts of torture are offences under their criminal law punishable by appropriate penalties which take into account their grave nature (Article 4). This obligation of States parties to criminalize torture is modelled on earlier counterterrorism treaties and was at the time of drafting of the Convention new and almost revolutionary in the context of a typical human rights treaty. However, thirty years after the entry into force of the Convention, we realize that only a minority of States parties in fact fully complied with this important legal obligation.

In addition to including torture as a crime in their domestic criminal codes, States parties have an obligation to establish their jurisdiction on the basis of the territoriality, flag, active and passive nationality as well as the universal jurisdiction principles (Article 5). In other words, no safe havens for perpetrators of torture shall continue to exist in our contemporary global world. Wherever a perpetrator of torture is travelling or residing, the authorities of the respective State have an obligation to arrest him or her, to make a preliminary inquiry into the facts, and to decide in accordance with the principle 'aut dedere aut iudicare' whether to extradite the person to his or her country of origin, residence, or commission of the act of torture, or to prosecute the person before their own domestic criminal courts (Articles 5 to 9). Unfortunately, very few countries have so far complied with these obligations, but a few encouraging cases show that the awareness is growing that safe havens for perpetrators of torture, whether police officers, prison guards, military commanders, or Heads of State or Government of States responsible for systematic practices of torture, are no longer permissible.⁴⁴

The international monitoring of States' compliance with their obligations under the Convention follows that of other UN human rights treaties: the establishment of an independent treaty monitoring body, the Committee against Torture consisting of ten independent experts from different fields of expertise, with a mandate to examine mandatory State reports (Article 19) and optional inter-State (Article 21) and individual complaints (Article 22). The only innovative provision was the introduction of an ex officio inquiry procedure by the Committee in case it 'receives reliable information which appears to it to contain well-founded indications that torture is being systematically practised' (Article 20). This procedure is not dependent on any complaints and may lead to a fact finding investigation on the spot. However, during the drafting of the Convention this potentially strong procedure has been considerably watered down. States parties may 'opt out' of the procedure by a reservation in accordance with Article 28, the entire procedure is highly confidential, and any fact-finding visits to the territory of the country concerned are dependent on an explicit agreement by the respective Government. Nevertheless, the Committee so far has completed ten inquiries in relation to Turkey, Egypt, Peru, Sri Lanka, Mexico, Serbia and Montenegro, Brazil, Nepal, Lebanon, and, again, Egypt.⁴⁵ Finally, with respect to States parties to the OP, the Subcommittee on Prevention (SPT) has the mandate to carry out preventive missions and unannounced visits to all places of detention, to conduct private interviews with all detainees, to assist the respective national preventive mechanisms and to make recommendations to the States parties concerned (Articles 11–16 OP).

More than thirty years after the entry into force of the CAT 162 States have ratified the main treaty to fight torture and other forms of ill-treatment. However, despite the broad ratification and the universal recognition of the prohibition of torture and other forms of ill-treatment we witness a 'global crisis'⁴⁶ affecting the majority of countries worldwide. At the end of his six-year term as UN Special Rapporteur on Torture, Manfred Nowak concluded that torture exists in roughly 90% of all States, that it constitutes a routine phenomenon of police behaviour in more than half of all States, and that it is systematically practised in some 10% of all States. In addition, he identified a global prison crisis as the conditions of detention in most States of the world amount to inhuman or degrading treatment.⁴⁷ The lack of implementation of the CAT obligations is due to dysfunctional criminal justice systems, corruption and insufficient capacities of state authorities, as well as a lack of political will to fight this horrible practice. In recent years the protection of human rights is experiencing a particularly serious crisis—also affecting the phenomenon of torture—in which official narratives and public belief often trivialize and even endorse such practices in the name of security and the fight against terrorism, ignoring the suffering and damages it causes. On the other hand, the positive experiences in some States illustrate that torture can be eradicated if the provisions of CAT and OPCAT are taken seriously and are being fully implemented.

4. Rules of Interpretation

According to Article 31 VCLT, an international treaty 'shall be interpreted ... in accordance with the ordinary meaning to be given to the terms of the treaty in their context and in light of its object and purpose'. Thus, of primary significance is the textual, contextual, systematic and teleological interpretation, whereby, in addition to the treaty wording, consideration is also given to the Preamble.⁴⁸ The object and purpose of the Convention and Protocol can be derived from the desire of the drafters, as laid down in the respective Preambles: on the one side to make the struggle against torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment 'more effective' and, on the other side, to strengthen the protection of persons deprived of their liberty against torture and other forms of ill-treatment by establishing a system of preventive visits to all places of detention. Any interpretation which would lead to the weakening of already existing norms for the prohibition and prevention of torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment has thus been avoided. Systematic interpretation may be facilitated by a comparative analysis of similar international or regional human rights treaties, such as the CCPR, the Inter-American Convention to Prevent and Punish Torture 1985, or the ECPT. The subsequent practice of States parties, to be considered pursuant to Article 31(3) VCLT, can in part be derived from relevant reservations and declarations of interpretation, as well as from State reports and observations submitted by States parties.

Human rights texts are often characterized by a high degree of abstraction and vagueness. If the textual, contextual, systematic, and teleological interpretation 'leaves the meaning ambiguous or obscure, or leads to a result which is manifestly absurd or unreasonable', Article 32 VCLT permits additional tools to be drawn upon, in particular, the preparatory work of the treaty ('travaux préparatoires'). The historical background of the CAT and the OP, above all the detailed discussions in the respective inter-sessional Working Groups of the UN Commission on Human Rights, has been outlined in relation to every Article and was used in the present Commentary as a source of interpretation whenever the meaning of a certain provision remained ambiguous.

The most important sources of information used in this Commentary as a tool for interpreting the provisions of the Convention is the practice of the Committee against Torture, be it in the State reporting, individual complaints and inquiry procedures. The same is valid for the practice of the SPT with regard to the Optional Protocol. In particular, decisions and statements of the Committee based on consensus rank highly in the interpretation of the Convention, even though these are not internationally binding. For the purpose of the present Commentary, the entire case law on individual complaints, the 'General Comments', country-specific comments, and observations in the State reporting procedure, as well as the reports in the inquiry procedure have been treated as an 'authoritative interpretation' of the relevant provisions of the Convention. The case law and practice of other treaty monitoring bodies, such as the UN Human Rights Committee, Special Procedures of the Human Rights Council, above the Special Rapporteur on Torture, as well as regional bodies, such as the European, African, and Inter-American ⁴⁸ See eg Ian Brownlie, Principles of Public International Law (5th edn, Clarendon Press 1998) 605; Manfred Nowak, UN Covenant on Civil and Political Rights: CCPR Commentary (2nd rev edn, NP Engel 2005) (CCPR Commentary) XXVI.

Courts/Commissions of Human Rights or the CPT, have also been taken into account, as was the case with relevant literature.

5. Reservations, Declarations of Interpretation, and Denunciation of the Convention and Protocol

Article 19(c) VCLT provides that reservations are, in the absence of a treaty provision to the contrary, permissible in so far as they are not 'incompatible with the object and purpose of the treaty'. While the CAT permits specific 'opting-out' reservations under Articles 28(1) and 30(2), no general provision concerning the permission or prohibition of reservations or declarations of interpretation can be found. In our opinion, the fact that Articles 28(1) and 30(2) permit specific reservations cannot be used as an argument that other reservations and declarations of interpretation are generally prohibited.⁴⁹ However, Article 30 OP contains a general prohibition of reservations to the Protocol.⁵⁰

In addition to the specific 'opting-out' reservations foreseen in Articles 28(1) and 30(2) and the optional declarations in accordance with Articles 21(1) and 22(1) CAT, only a few States have submitted reservations or declarations of interpretation.⁵¹ Article 20(5) VCLT states that, in the absence of a treaty provision to the contrary, a reservation qualifies as accepted if a State does not raise an objection within twelve months of notification. In practice, very few objections have been lodged. For example, eight States parties objected to a reservation by Qatar regarding any interpretation of the provisions of the Convention incompatible with the precepts of Islamic law and the Islamic religion.⁵²

Whether a reservation is compatible with the object and purpose of the Convention is a question which needs to be determined by the Committee against Torture.⁵³ If the Committee finds a certain reservation to be incompatible with the object and purpose of the Convention, this reservation must be considered as invalid and can be severed from the instrument of ratification, so that the reserving State is fully bound by the treaty, including the provisions to which the reservation related.⁵⁴ In practice, the Committee has on several occasions voiced its concern over broad and imprecise reservations, as well as reservations having a limiting effect on the Convention, and has issued recommendations to these States parties to withdraw them.⁵⁵

Article 31 CAT and Article 33 OP explicitly provide for the right of States parties to denounce the Convention and the Protocol at any time by written notification addressed to the Secretary General of the United Nations. So far, no State party has made use of this right.⁵⁶

⁴⁹ But see the first chairman of the Committee, Joseph Voyame, in the discussion of the initial State report of Chile: 'The Convention permitted reservations only in particular cases but not on a general basis, and he accordingly concluded that other reservations besides those provided for in the Convention were not admissible': CAT/C/SR.40, para 36. Preamble

The States Parties to this Convention,

Having regard to article 5 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and article 7 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, both of which provide that no one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment,

Having regard also to the Declaration on the Protection of All Persons from Being Subjected to Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, adopted by the General Assembly on 9 December 1975,

Desiring to make more effective the struggle against torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment throughout the world,

Have agreed as follows:

1. Introduction

Under Article 31 of the VCLT, the provisions of international treaties are not to be interpreted in isolation but rather in their context. The treaty's text including the preamble and annexes, together with relevant agreements between the States parties, may be drawn upon. This legal significance of the preamble has been generally recognized under international law.¹

Like most other international human rights treaties, the Convention against Torture contains an extensive preamble. It places the obligations of States parties contained in the Convention in the context of the principles proclaimed in the Charter of the United Nations, and it emphasizes the natural-law origins of human rights. The text is based on the preambles of the two International Covenants of 1966² and of the Declaration on the Protection of All Persons from Being Subjected to Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, adopted by the General Assembly of 1975.³ The text, as proposed in the original Swedish draft of 1980, was unanimously adopted with only a few changes suggested during the drafting in the Working Group of the Commission on Human Rights. The preamble reiterates the absolute prohibition of torture and CIDT, as contained in Article 5 UDHR and Article 7 CCPR, and expresses the desire ‘to make more effective the struggle against Torture’ and CIDT. This seems to constitute the central object and purpose of the Convention.

*Declaration (9 December 1975)*⁴

The General Assembly,

Considering that, in accordance with the principles proclaimed in the Charter of the United Nations, recognition of the inherent dignity and of the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family is the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world, ⁵ Proposal for the Preamble and the Final Provisions of the Draft Convention (1980) UN Doc E/CN.4/1427.

Considering the obligation of States under the Charter of the United Nations to promote universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms,

Having regard to article 5 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and article 7 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, both of which provide that no one may be subjected to torture or to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment,

Having regard also to the Declaration on the Protection of All Persons from Being Subjected to Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, adopted by the General Assembly on 9 December 1975 (resolution 3452 (XXX)),

Desiring to convert the principles of the Declaration into binding treaty obligations and to adopt a system for their effective implementation,

Have agreed as follows:

2.2 Analysis of Working Group Discussions

Whereas the Working Group of the Commission on Human Rights had already begun discussing the substantive elements of the Convention in 1980, work on the preamble only began in 1983. The Group took as its basis the draft clauses submitted by Sweden in 1980.⁶

The first issue raised by various delegations within the Working Group concerned the scope of the Convention as defined in the title and reflected in the text. The preamble was regarded by all as a reiteration of the purpose of the Convention at hand. In order to ascertain whether the object and purpose of the treaty was accurately reflected in the text, it was deemed relevant to discuss the overall scope of the Convention within the specific discussion of the preamble itself. While some delegations expressed the view that the draft Convention related principally to criminal law and procedure and that this should be reflected in the title of the instrument,⁷ others noted that this was not necessarily the case. As one representative pointed out, the subject-matter of the Convention against Torture is inherently linked to the agenda item under which it had previously been discussed, namely, 'The question of the human rights of all persons subjected to any form of detention or imprisonment'.⁸ The Swedish delegation, however, argued that the subject-matter of the Convention had already been defined by the mandate given to the Commission as laid out in General Assembly Resolution 32/62:

To draw up a draft Convention against torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment in the light of the principles embodied in the Declaration on the Protection of All Persons from Being Subjected to Torture and other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment.⁹

This mandate had been confirmed by subsequent General Assembly resolutions. According to the Swedish representative, it therefore followed that no limitations applied to the subject-matter of the Convention other than those specified in the aforementioned mandate.

Discussion then proceeded onto the preambular clauses themselves. A first suggestion made was to delete the phrase 'of the inherent dignity and' which existed in both the first and the second paragraphs. Since there was general agreement that the words were redundant, the suggestion was accepted and the change made to the first paragraph.¹⁰

With regard to the third paragraph, a proposal was made to include a reference to the principle of non-discrimination as enshrined in either Article 55 of the United Nations Charter, or in Article 2(1) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. This suggestion received wide support from the Working Group and the text was amended so as to include a mention of Article 55.¹¹

Several delegations within the Working Group expressed discontent with the sixth preambular clause as drafted by Sweden.¹² The observer for Amnesty International, for instance, argued that the clause in question risked undermining the authority and effectiveness of the 1975 Declaration.¹³ As a result, the following phrase was proposed by the Argentine delegation as a replacement for the Swedish draft: 'Desiring to make more effective the struggle against torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment throughout the world'.¹⁴ The proposal gained general support and was subsequently accepted by the Working Group.

The appropriate amendments, as detailed above, were made and the Chairman-Rapporteur of the sessional Working Group, Jan Herman Burgers, submitted the revised set of preambular clauses which were then adopted by the Group during its 1983 session.¹⁵

There was still, however, one outstanding issue. During the second reading of the draft preambular clauses, which took place at the 11th meeting,¹⁶ the Peruvian delegation had proposed the following paragraph for inclusion in the preamble:

Recognizing that the essential rights of men are not derived from one's being a national of a certain State, but are based upon attributes of the human personality, and that they therefore justify international protection in the form of a convention.¹⁷

The Group was of the opinion that this was a proposal that warranted careful deliberation at a later stage. The Group recommenced the discussion of this proposal in 1984 when it was agreed that although the intention of the Peruvian delegation was commendable, the ideas contained in the proposal were too broad and too controversial for inclusion.¹⁸ Moreover, it was largely agreed that the existing second paragraph of the preamble incorporated many of the same ideas without being couched in as broad terms. The Peruvian delegation thus withdrew its proposal and the Group decided that the preamble would consist of the revised set of clauses as adopted in 1983.¹⁹

3. Issues of Interpretation

The first paragraph is modelled on the first preambular paragraph of both Covenants. The phrase ‘recognition of the inherent dignity’ was, however, deleted during the Working Group discussions because these words were also contained in the second paragraph. The term ‘principles proclaimed in the Charter of the United Nations’ refers both to the principles enshrined in Article 2 and to the purposes of the United Nations laid down in Article 1 of the Charter,²⁰ ie peace and security, development and human rights. The interdependence of these three main objectives of the world organization was emphasized by former Secretary General Kofi Annan in his well-known report ‘In Larger Freedom’ of 21 March 2005 as follows: ‘Accordingly, we will not enjoy development without security, we will not enjoy security without development, and we will not enjoy either without respect for human rights’.²¹ The significance of human rights as a precondition for both security and development was already envisaged in the preambles of both Covenants and the CAT which state that recognition of human rights ‘is the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world’.

The second paragraph is identical with the second preambular paragraph of both Covenants and expresses, like the first paragraph, that human rights have their origin in natural law. The reference to the ‘inherent dignity of the human person’ is of particular relevance for the prohibition and prevention of torture as any act of torture, like slavery, constitutes a direct and deliberate attack on the dignity of the human person. Torture presupposes a situation in which one person exercises total control over another person. The victim of torture finds itself in a situation of powerlessness, and the perpetrator aims at depriving the victim of its dignity and humanity.²²

The third paragraph is taken from the fourth preambular paragraph of both Covenants. During the drafting in the Working Group, a particular reference to Article 55 of the UN Charter was added. According to Article 55(c), the United Nations shall promote ‘universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion’. It is this emphasis on the principle of non-discrimination which the drafters had in mind when proposing an explicit reference to Article 55.²³ This principle is also stressed in Article 1 CAT: in addition to extraction of a confession or information, punishment and intimidation, discrimination is explicitly listed as one of the purposes of torture.²⁴

The fourth paragraph refers to the absolute prohibition of torture and CIDT, as contained in already existing instruments, such as Article 5 UDHR and Article 7 CCPR. Apart from its preamble, the Convention against Torture does not contain any provision explicitly prohibiting torture or CIDT or providing for a human right not to be subjected to torture or CIDT. The Convention only contains additional obligations of States parties to criminalize torture under domestic law, to provide victims of torture with a right to remedy and reparation, and to prevent torture and CIDT.

The fifth paragraph refers to the 1975 Declaration which forms the direct basis for the Convention against Torture. In the United Nations, binding human rights treaties are often preceded by a non-binding declaration on the same subject. As the UDHR of 1948 formed the basis for the two Covenants of 1966, the same three steps (declaration, convention, and implementation) are often found in relation to specialized human rights topics as well.²⁵ Most of the ideas of strengthening the prohibition and prevention of torture and CIDT, which are elaborated in the Convention against Torture, were already contained in the 1975 Declaration. The original Swedish Draft of 1980, which formed the principal basis for the drafting of the Convention in the Working Group, is to a great extent modelled on the 1975 Declaration. This was explicitly mentioned in the sixth preambular paragraph of the Swedish Draft which expressed the desire 'to convert the principles of the Declaration into binding treaty obligations and to adopt a system for their effective implementation'.²⁶ During the discussions in the Working Group, the observer for Amnesty International and others regarded this formulation as undermining the authority and effectiveness of the 1975 Declaration and, consequently, replaced it with a stronger wording.²⁷

The final wording of the sixth paragraph is based on an Argentine amendment in the Working Group of 1983.²⁸ This formulation expresses the overall objective of the Convention against Torture: the desire 'to make more effective the struggle against torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment throughout the world'. It reflects the experience that the mere prohibition of torture and other ill forms of ill treatment under international human rights law is not enough to eradicate this 'plague of the twentieth century'. Innovative ideas were brought forward to make the struggle against torture more effective: the IAPL Draft proposed to make torture a crime under international law, similar to genocide and apartheid, and to require States to bring the perpetrators of torture to justice before domestic courts; the original Swedish Draft introduced the principle of universal criminal jurisdiction, based on various treaties combating the crimes of terrorism and hijacking, and contained a number of specific State obligations to prevent torture; and the Costa Rica Draft suggested a system of preventive visits to all places of detention, based on the experience of the ICRC. It is surprising that, despite strong opposition by a large number of States from all regions of the world, the Working Group, under the efficient chair of Jan Herman Burgers from the Netherlands, succeeded to include most of these ideas in the final text of the Convention.²⁹ In addition to a broad variety of provisions aimed at preventing torture, providing support to torture victims, and at bringing perpetrators of torture to justice before domestic courts, the Convention also contains a new procedure of international monitoring, ie an ex officio inquiry procedure in case of systematic practice of torture.³⁰ The following article by article analysis of all provisions of the Convention will show the extent to which these innovative provisions of combating torture and other ill-treatment were actually implemented by States parties during the thirty years since the entry into force of the Convention on 26 June 1987.

Article 1

Definition of Torture

1. For the purposes of this Convention, torture means any act by which severe pain or suffering, whether physical or mental, is intentionally inflicted on a person for such purposes as obtaining from him or a third person information or a confession, punishing him for an act he or a third person has committed or is suspected of having committed, or intimidating or coercing him or a third person, or for any reason based on discrimination of any kind, when such pain or suffering is inflicted by or at the instigation of or with the consent or acquiescence of a public official or other person acting in an official capacity. It does not include pain or suffering arising only from, inherent in or incidental to lawful sanctions.

1. Introduction

1 Article 1 CAT is the first provision in an international treaty which defines torture. It served as a model for the definition contained in Article 2 of the Inter-American Convention to Prevent and Punish Torture adopted in 1985. Article 1 has to be read in conjunction with Article 16, which requires States parties to prevent 'other acts of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment which do not amount to torture as defined in article 1'. The distinction between torture and other forms of ill-treatment, all of which are absolutely prohibited under Article 7 CCPR and other international and regional treaty provisions as well as customary international law, was introduced because some of the specific State obligations laid down in the CAT, above all the obligation to punish the perpetrators of torture by means of domestic criminal law, were meant to apply to torture only. While there have been different approaches regarding how to differentiate torture and other ill-treatment—either by the severity of pain or the purpose of the conduct—there is an increasing consensus that purpose constitutes the relevant distinguishing criterion. Additionally, powerlessness has become a significant criterion to distinguish between torture and other forms of ill-treatment.

2 The main elements of the definition of torture are the following:

- involvement of a public official;
- infliction of severe pain or suffering;
- intention;
- specific purpose

3 As with any legal definition, many questions of interpretation arise which will be addressed on the basis of the travaux préparatoires, reservations and declarations of States parties, information provided in State reports, the practice of the Committee and other relevant monitoring bodies, legal literature, and other sources. Beside the discussions on how to distinguish torture from other forms of ill-treatment and the meaning of powerlessness, the interpretation of the lawful sanctions clause has been particularly controversial.

2.2 Analysis of Working Group Discussions

8 Regarding the scope of Article 1, the preliminary deliberations in the Human Rights Commission's various Working Groups on this point were conducted on the basis of a draft Convention submitted by Sweden to the thirty-fourth Session of the Human Rights

³ Draft International Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhumane or Degrading Treatment or Punishment Submitted by Sweden (1978) UN Doc E/CN.4/1285.

Commission in 1978.⁵ States were also presented with a draft text submitted by the International Association of Penal Law⁶ whose definition only included acts of torture. There was very little debate on the IAPL draft concerning Article I.

9 Discussions began within the Informal Working Group in 1978 and later during the session of the Working Group in 1979 without any agreement being reached as to the scope of Article 1. It emerged that certain delegates rejected the reference in Article 1(2) of the draft Swedish Convention to torture as an 'aggravated and deliberate form of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment' on the basis that the concept was too vague to be included in a Convention which was to form the basis for criminal legislation in the contracting States.⁷ The opposing opinion was that both concepts should be included in the Convention given that it was not deemed possible to draw a strict line between acts of torture and other lesser forms of acts of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, reasoning that torture is merely the most extreme of such acts.

10 In written comments in 1978 the United States made clear their position that the Convention should be focused primarily on the prevention and suppression of acts clearly identifiable as torture, arguing that this was necessary in light of the severe penalties, broad jurisdictional provisions, and definitional difficulties embodied in the Convention along with the need for broad international acceptance. The United States further stated that it was not their intention to denigrate the fact that acts of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment not clearly amounting to torture are serious offences. At the same time, they sought to emphasize that torture is the most extreme form of acts of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment and that unfortunately it was not possible to draw a sharp line between other lesser forms of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment and torture.

11 Several Governments suggested that the definition of torture should be modified and that the concept of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment should be clarified. Spain argued that the difficulties inherent in arriving at a legal definition of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment made it advisable to limit the scope of the Convention exclusively to torture which, they argued, was the main concern of the Convention according to Articles 7 and 8. The German Democratic Republic was of the same opinion, stating that there was no clear definition of the criteria by which other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment was to be judged and that these defects could not be remedied by listing certain actions described as torture and that therefore it would be appropriate to limit the draft Convention to torture. The USSR were also of the opinion that the concepts of torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment should be regarded as legally distinct in order to avoid imprecision and ambiguity as to the specific meaning of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment since the institution of punishment is legally applicable to persons who have committed an offence.⁸ The Federal Republic of Germany argued that since the draft Convention establishes legal obligations for States, the term torture should be defined and distinguished as precisely as possible from the 'marginally different' term of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment.⁹

12 On the other hand France made clear its position that cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment involves acts of physical or mental torture and that no distinction should be drawn between the two; that, on the contrary, torture should be defined in such a way as to encompass both. At the same time Switzerland argued that any definition could have the effect of limiting the scope of the concept which it sets out to define and that therefore it was essential to ensure that the definition of torture did not result in any weakening of existing law, which prohibits torture and inhuman treatment unconditionally and in the same manner and makes no distinction as to the respective seriousness of such acts. The Swiss Government argued that for these reasons the Convention should cover acts of torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment, on the same footing and proposed the following text: ‘the term “torture” includes, cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.’¹⁰

13 During deliberations in the 1979 Working Group many delegations expressed the view that Article 1(2) of the original Swedish draft risked unduly restricting the definition of torture and should be deleted. On the other hand several delegates pointed out that the deletion of this reference would not in any case prejudge the broader issue of whether subsequent articles of the Convention should apply only to torture or also to other forms of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment. Article 1(2) was placed in square brackets to be discussed at a later date.

14 This matter was resolved during the 1980 Working Group through the inclusion in Article 16(1) of language providing that the obligations in the Convention and, ‘in particular’, contained in the text of Articles [3], 10, 11, 12, 13, [14] and [15] which only apply to torture, should also apply to other forms of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment. During the debate in the 1980 Working Group one delegate pointed out that Article 1(3) of the revised Swedish text had specified that the Article was without prejudice to provisions of a wider application relating to the subject matter of the Convention and that similarly Article 16 (of the revised Swedish draft) was a saving clause affirming the continued validity of other instruments prohibiting punishments or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment. It was at this point that a proposal was made to have the following text as paragraph 1 of Article 16 with the original text of the revised Swedish version appearing as Article 16(2):

Each State Party shall undertake to prevent in any territory under its jurisdiction other acts of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment which do not constitute torture as defined in Article I, when such acts are committed by or at the instigation of or with the consent or acquiescence of a public official or other person acting in an official capacity. In particular, the obligations contained in Articles [3], 10, 11, 12,13, [14] and [15] shall apply with the substitution for references to torture of references to other forms of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.¹¹

15 In support of the proposal it was emphasized that international conventions that prohibit cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment, and in particular the CCPR and the ECHR, were already in force and that the prohibition was necessary to prevent offenders from taking advantage of an unduly narrow interpretation of the word ‘torture’. Other delegates felt that the concepts were too vague to be applied at the criminal law and police regulation levels.

16 Some delegates proposed replacing the term 'to prevent' by 'to prohibit' in the above proposal for the text of Article 16(1). However, this proposal was not taken up in the final text of Article 16.

17 At the same time the authors of the proposal agreed to delete the words 'in particular' in the French text of the proposal (although the wording of the CAT retains the words 'en particulier'). Further, one delegate expressed a reservation with respect to Article 16(2) stating that there was no necessity for such a provision.

18 During the 1981 and 1982 Working Groups certain delegations argued for and against the retention of the bracketed Article 1(2). Those arguing in favour of retaining Article 1(2) considered it essential to affirm from the very outset that the prohibition of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment was included within the scope of the Convention and to make it clear that torture was, in their view, at the highest end of a scale of such treatment or punishment. Such a clarification was necessary in order that the crime of torture be defined with sufficient precision for purposes of their domestic criminal law. Other delegations, pointing out that there was no universally accepted concept of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment, felt that the reference in Article 1(2) as then worded would be far too vague for inclusion in a treaty, and that it would tend to bring imprecision to the concept of torture which had been agreed upon in Article 1(1).¹² As a result of the discussion in the 1982 Working Group and the incorporation of new language in Article 16(1), the Group decided to delete Article 1(2). At the same time it was agreed that the term 'national legislation' in Article 1(3) be replaced with 'national law' in order to bring that paragraph into line with Article 16(2).

19 Debate on the scope of the proposed Article 16 and in particular its reference to Articles 3, 14, and 15 continued in the 1981 Working Group. Some delegates were of the opinion that no reference should be made to Articles 3, 14, and 15. After discussion, the Working Group decided to delete the reference to Articles 3 and 15 and to retain the reference to Article 14, between square brackets. Articles 16 (1) and (2) were adopted.

20 Discussion continued in the 1982 Working Group where the United States introduced an amendment to include either the following phrases, 'which are not sufficient to constitute torture' or 'which do not amount to torture', after the words 'inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment'. In support of the amendment, several speakers considered it important to indicate clearly in the Convention that torture was the gravest form of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment and that the whole range of such treatment or punishment should be covered by some articles at least of the Convention. Some other delegations felt, however, that the proposal introduced an undesirable element of vagueness into the text. One opinion was that the difference between torture, as defined or referred to in national laws and in some international decisions, and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment was one of substance and not of degree. After some debate, it was agreed to adopt the second alternative on the understanding that no delegation maintained its objection against this formulation.

21 As regards the reference to Article 14 in Article 16(1) regarding compensation some speakers, referring to Article 11 of the 1975 Declaration against Torture, favoured a reference on the grounds that victims of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment may have a legitimate claim to compensation. Other representatives did not feel that extension of the scope of their compensation laws to an ill-defined field to include all such treatments would be warranted. Since no consensus could be reached, the Group decided to revert to this question at a later stage.¹³ No consensus was possible either in the 1983 Working Group. During the 1984 Working Group several delegates expressed themselves in favour of including the reference to Article 14 in Article 16(1). Some of the other speakers opposed the reference, fearing that the concept of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment was too imprecise as a basis for an enforceable right to compensation and might lead to difficulties of interpretation and possible abuses. While one representative suggested that the Working Group might try again to agree on a definition of this concept, others, who were in favour of including the reference, expressed the opinion that a definition was not necessary and that each country would develop its own case law on this matter. India asked that reference be made in the report to the general reservation concerning Article 14 which her delegation had entered at the previous session. The representative of Spain proposed the inclusion of references to Articles 3, 14, and 15 in Article 16(1), in order for the mechanism of protection to be in harmony with the title of the Convention itself which included 'other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment' arguing that if reference to these three articles was not acceptable to the Working Group, then the second sentence of paragraph 1 should be deleted. One other representative also proposed the deletion of the second sentence. In light of the ensuing discussion and in view of the fact that some of these issues had been debated in the past, the representative of Spain, in a spirit of compromise, withdrew his proposal. The representative of the USSR, in an effort to help overcome the difficulties with regard to the question, suggested that the Convention could specify that, in such a case, compensation would be limited to material damage and damage to the health of a person.¹⁴ After further consultations, the Chairman Rapporteur noted that several delegations which had favoured the inclusion of a reference to Article 14 had now indicated that they would not insist on such a reference if it created an obstacle to reaching agreement on draft Article 16. At its eleventh meeting, the Working Group decided to adopt draft Article 16, limiting the reference in the first paragraph to Articles 10, 11, 12, and 13. The delegations of Canada and Ireland stated that they had not opposed the adoption of Article 16, but that they wished to see registered in the report that their Governments retained a strong preference for including a reference to Article 14 in this provision. In written comments the representative of Canada outlined that his delegation had made considerable concessions in the Working Group, particularly in the matter of compensation for victims of cruel or degrading treatment and that the very definition of torture did not seem to his delegation to go far enough.¹⁵ The delegation of the USSR, drawing attention to the fact that Article 16 was the only provision referring to acts of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment which did not amount to torture, expressed the view that the provision should have been presented in a more detailed way, with a more precise definition, so that the article would have a stronger effect. To this end the delegation had proposed reproducing the provisions of other instruments which had binding force for States parties.¹⁶ The delegation, considering it possible to adopt Article 16 without a reference to Article 14, stated that it would not insist on its proposal. However, it emphasized that, if in the course of the further consideration of Article 16 some delegations again raised the question of the necessity of including a reference to Article 14 in Article 16, it would return to its proposal.¹⁷

22 There was no difficulty encountered in the drafting stage about the meaning of ‘any act by which severe pain or suffering ...’. The wording of the alternative IAPL draft referred to ‘any conduct’. In written comments Barbados sought to change the phrase in Article III (a) from ‘such conduct’ to ‘acts of torture’.¹⁸ However there was no mention of the question in the preparatory works about whether or not an omission such as omission of food, water, or medical attention would be regarded as a prohibited act and neither is this mentioned expressis verbis in the Convention.

23 It is interesting to note that during the drafting of the UN Declaration on Torture of 1975, from which the language of Article 1 of the original Swedish draft of 1978 was borrowed, a proposal that the word ‘severe’ be deleted and that it be made clear that the Article would not apply to a penalty or punishment imposed by a judicial tribunal in accordance with law or to a disciplinary administrative action taken under the provisions of the Standard Minimum Rules, had been rejected.¹⁹ The final text of the Declaration thus defined torture as ‘any act by which severe pain or suffering ... is ... inflicted’. This notion of severity of pain or suffering was adopted in the original Swedish draft (‘torture means any act by which severe pain or suffering ... is ... inflicted’) and appeared also in the alternative IAPL draft (‘torture is any conduct by which severe pain or suffering ... is ... inflicted’).

24 In written comments, this point was addressed by a number of States. The United States, being of the opinion that torture is the most extreme form of acts of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment, supported the inclusion of the notion of severity of pain or suffering, arguing that a requisite ‘intensity’ and ‘severity’ of pain or suffering was an inherent element of the offence of torture and proposing the language ‘extremely severe pain and suffering’ as an alternative to mere ‘severe’ pain and suffering as appeared in the original Swedish draft.²⁰ At the same time they indicated that in their view, although conduct which may result in permanent impairment of physical or mental faculties may be indicative of torture, it is not an essential element of the offence. The German Democratic Republic drew attention to the fact that the wording ‘... act by which severe pain or suffering, whether physical or mental ...’ could be interpreted in many ways. The

Swiss delegation, of the opinion that no distinction should be made between torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment, advocated that no distinction be made as to the respective seriousness of the acts.²¹

25 The United Kingdom was of the opinion that the definition of torture in the original Swedish draft should be made more consistent with the definition in the jurisprudence of the ECtHR and to this end suggested that the word 'extreme' should be substituted for the word 'severe'.²² In the same year the ECtHR in the Ireland v. United Kingdom case had drawn a distinction between torture and inhuman and degrading treatment based primarily on a progression of severity, arguing that the distinction was necessary because a 'special stigma' attaches to torture. It has been suggested that the United Kingdom wanted to reaffirm the relative intensity of pain and suffering notion, presumably to preserve the perceived benefits of the decision in Ireland v United Kingdom.²³ This proposal was not taken up and Article 1, with its reference to the word 'severe', was adopted by the Working Group prior to the thirty-fifth session of the Commission on Human Rights.

26 Following its finalization by the Working Group of the Commission on Human Rights the representative of the USSR introduced amendments to the draft resolution²⁴ which proposed the deletion of the word 'severe' before 'pain and suffering' in the debates of the Third Committee.²⁵ However, the final text of the Convention retained the notion of severity as it appeared in the original Swedish draft text.

27 The 1975 Declaration, the original Swedish draft, the IAPL draft, and the final text of the Convention all refer to 'severe pain or suffering, whether physical or mental'. During the drafting Portugal considered that it would be useful expressly to include a reference to the use of psychiatry for political purposes in the definition of torture²⁶ and proposed that 'the abuse of psychiatry with a view to prolonging the confinement of any person subjected to a measure or penalty involving deprivation of freedom shall be regarded as torture' be added to the text of Article 1(1). While this proposal could be indicative of the types of acts which the delegations considered could in certain instances constitute mental torture, the criteria as to what constitutes 'mental pain or suffering', as with the concepts of torture or indeed cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment, are unclear and were not debated by the Working Group. The German Democratic Republic stated that the wording could be interpreted in many ways. One delegation felt that the term 'mental torture' was not a clear enough term for the purpose of the criminal law of States.²⁷ The United Kingdom went along with this, arguing that the concept was too ambiguous for national courts of States to assess, especially when dealing with the motive of discrimination.²⁸ They expressed concern that in certain aspects the definition of Article 1 of the draft Convention was rather loose and susceptible to subjective interpretation, highlighting in particular that it would be difficult for courts to assess the concept of mental suffering, particularly when linked to a motive such as discrimination.

28 Regarding situations where no physical or mental pain or suffering is apparent in the complainant, Barbados proposed that the Commission consider expanding the definition of torture to include the use of more sophisticated weapons such as ‘truth drugs’ where no physical or mental suffering is apparent in the complainant.²⁹

29 The above conduct is prohibited when it ‘is intentionally inflicted on a person’. This seems to imply the exclusion of negligent conduct from the application of Article 1. However, no reference was made to the question as to when a particular conduct ceases to be considered purely negligent in the drafting history. The United States expressed dissatisfaction with this term, preferring ‘deliberate’ and ‘malicious’ over ‘intentional’. They proposed that Article 1(1) read ‘for the purposes of the present convention, the offence of torture includes any act by which extremely severe pain or suffering, whether physical or mental, is deliberately and maliciously inflicted on a person by or with the consent or acquiescence of a public official’.³⁰ The concept of acquiescence of a public official rather than ‘instigation by’ was proposed in order that it be made clear that the public official has a clear duty to act to prevent torture. No other State commented on this point and it elicited no serious discussion by the Working Group. The US proposal was not adopted. Neither was a UK proposal that the pain not only be intentionally, but also ‘systematically’ inflicted.³¹ It appears that the drafters of the present Convention considered the phrase ‘severe pain’ sufficient to convey the idea that only acts of a certain gravity be considered to constitute torture and that it was not considered necessary that the pain be inflicted systematically. It follows that even single, isolated acts can be considered to constitute torture.

30 The conduct must be carried out for the purpose of achieving a specific result. Article 1(1) contains a non-exhaustive list of objectives, leaving room to qualify action as torture if it is applied with a different objective than that stated. Burgers and *Danelius*³² note that the words ‘such purposes as ...’ mean that other objectives than those named must indeed have something in common with the objectives mentioned, ie the existence of some—even remote—connection with the interests or policies of the State and its organs. This is supported by the objective of the Convention as it appears in the travaux préparatoires and the preamble, ie the bringing to an end of torture by or under the responsibility of public authorities.

31 Regarding the purposes for which torture was used, while some States supported a reference to it in Article 1, others stated that it should be deleted as too restrictive.³³ The legislative history indicates that the list of purposes is meant to be ‘indicative’ rather than ‘all-inclusive’.³⁴ The United Kingdom made the point that greater precision would have been achieved if the purposes were listed rather than exemplified in Article 1(1) while the Swiss delegation doubted that an exhaustive list would cover infliction of pain or suffering as a result of medical or scientific experimentation not required by the state of health of the individual. They therefore proposed that the following language be inserted after the first sentence of Article 1(1): 'It also means medical or scientific experiments that are not justified by a person's state of health and serve no therapeutic purpose.'³⁵ This would have been consistent with the CCPR and its travaux préparatoires but was not included in the final text. France, in its written comments on Article 1, was adamant that torture should not be defined in terms of the status and motives of the perpetrators of acts of torture owing to the fact that this reference might afford States parties a means of evading their commitment to prevent or punish all acts of torture regardless of the identity and goals of the perpetrators.³⁶ The Netherlands were also of the opinion that the list of purposes mentioned in Article 1(1) was illustrative, rather than exhaustive.³⁷

32 The same issue came up again at the thirty-fifth session of the Commission on Human Rights. During the 1979 Working Group there had been considerable discussion as to whether Article 1 should specify the purposes for which acts of torture might be perpetrated. Some delegates suggested that it would be unduly restrictive to specify any purposes at all; others indicated that the list of purposes was not an exhaustive one.³⁸ Several proposals were made for extending the list and general agreement was reached to include as torture such acts as inflict severe pain and suffering for any reason based on discrimination of any kind.³⁹ The United Kingdom expressed concern about including the phrase 'or for any reason based on discrimination of any kind' as it did not see the need to isolate this particular motivation and felt that it did not have the necessary degree of precision for a criminal offence. It requested that the following statement be included in the Group's report:

The United Kingdom shares the concern to eliminate all forms of torture, including any motivated by discrimination. The United Kingdom is doubtful of the need to isolate this particular motivation and in practical terms the United Kingdom thinks that there will in any case be difficulties in doing so with the necessary degree of precision for a criminal offence.⁴⁰

During the consideration of the Convention by the General Assembly for its adoption in 1984 the United States expressed its view that Article 1 should be understood to apply to both specific purposes mentioned in the definition, and to purposes or motives regardless of whether or not they were mentioned in Article 1.⁴¹ This proposal was reminiscent of similar proposals made during the drafting of the 1975 Declaration for the inclusion of 'or for any other purpose' after the words 'or other persons'.⁴² The United Kingdom made a further proposal to include in the definition the phenomenon of 'gratuitous torture'.⁴³ Finally Portugal sought to add to the non-exhaustive list, the use of psychiatry 'for the purpose of prolonging the confinement of any person subjected to a measure or penalty involving deprivation of freedom'.⁴⁴ It was also agreed that coercion should be included amongst the purposes listed in order to broaden their scope.⁴⁵

33 The language of the draft Swedish text⁴⁶ upon which the Working Group based the main part of its discussions refers to torture inflicted ‘by or at the instigation of a public official’. There was a lengthy discussion but no agreement on the definition of ‘public official’ by the Working Group. It was suggested that torture inflicted by persons other than public officials be included in the text of the Convention.⁴⁷ At the same time some speakers pointed out that the act of torture committed by a public official was different in nature from, and inherently more serious than, that inflicted by a private person, and that the elimination of the former category of torture should be the main target of the Convention.

34 During the discussion on the Convention in 1978 in the Third Committee of the General Assembly the French delegation proposed that private individuals be mentioned in Article 1. The Director of the UN’s Division of Human Rights intervened in favour of the proposal and pointed out that some States provided information on methods of torture and that perhaps States should give more consideration to the point.⁴⁸

35 In their written comments, some Governments submitted alternative text proposals. Austria proposed that the concept could be expanded to include ‘persons acting in an official capacity’.⁴⁹ The United Kingdom proposed to insert ‘or any other agent of the state’ after public official to add clarity to the definition.⁵⁰ Both the United States and the Federal Republic of Germany proposed that the term ‘public official’ be defined.⁵¹ The FRG’s proposal covered a wide range of cases and extended to individuals outside the Government. In particular they felt it should be made clear that public official included persons who, regardless of legal status, have been assigned public authority by State organs on a permanent basis or in an individual case, but also to persons who, in certain regions or under particular conditions, actually hold and exercise authority over others and whose authority is comparable to Government authority or—be it temporarily—has replaced Government authority or whose authority has been derived from such persons.⁵² The United States proposed a more elaborate definition of the concept ‘public official’ which sought to clarify the breadth of the concept and to make clear that both civil and military officials were included, expressing concern that the situation might arise where any person vested with the exercise of some official power of the State may well have sufficient authority to coerce another individual, and could escape prosecution under national law because of his public office. They therefore proposed the following language in order to cover such a scenario:

any public official who a) consents to an act of torture, b) assists, incites, solicits, commands, or conspires with others to commit torture, or c) fails to take appropriate measures to prevent or suppress torture when such person has knowledge or should have knowledge that torture has or is being committed and has authority or is in a position to take such measures, also commits the offence of torture within the meaning of this convention.⁵³

36 Barbados expressed the opinion that the definition be extended to cover acts of private individuals in light of the provisions of Articles 7 and 8 of the original Swedish draft.

They argued that Article 7 extends the concept of torture to cover the offences of complicity, participation, incitement, and attempt, and that since these offences are committed by private citizens this article was inconsistent with Article 1 which limits the definition of torture to acts of public officials. In the same way they argued that Article 8, which deals with offences committed on board ships and aircraft, necessarily referred to acts of individuals and therefore should be redefined to apply to the offences in Articles 7 and 8 as well as other acts of private individuals.⁵⁴

37 The draft IAPL Convention had also left room for the interpretation that it be applied to private individuals. Article II referred to acts 'inflicted on a person by or at the instigation of a public official'. Article III of this draft referred to 'a person' (ie rather than a public official).⁵⁵ Article III of the draft went on to illustrate the particular instances in which certain conduct would engender responsibility of a person for torture.⁵⁶

38 In written comments on the IAPL draft Barbados suggested that the definition should be extended to cover acts of individual citizens in order to harmonize Article III which treats the offences of incitement, participation, attempt, and complicity as acts of torture. Morocco went on to point out that it was not always easy for a public official to have 'reasonable belief' that torture had been committed by one of his subordinates and that it would also be difficult to prove that such a 'senior public official' had 'reasonable belief' or even knowledge that torture had been committed since, as far as the police, for example, were concerned, an interrogation frequently took place in private between the police officer and the suspect or accused, without witnesses. Furthermore, the legal repercussions of the articles seemed to imply a 'kind of immediate collective responsibility of public officials, whereas law always decreed the individuality of offences and therefore of penalties'. According to Morocco, Article II of the draft could give rise to a broad interpretation and lead to a general responsibility of officials, or even of the State, without even requiring that an investigation be carried out and before a decision on such responsibility is taken. Morocco went on to elaborate its views on State responsibility which it indicated could not be involved in such a situation because a crime involving torture committed by the officials of a State could not be attributed to that State except within the strict framework of the rules of international law governing State responsibility. None of the bilateral or multilateral international legal assistance agreements made such a 'hasty judgement' concerning State responsibility and it was therefore extremely desirable that the terms of the article be carefully amended. It should not, as it appeared to do, endorse a procedure which was as clearly contrary to legal practice as trials by hearsay; on the contrary it should insist that a preliminary legal investigation be carried out. It should also set out clearly the criteria for defining principal guilt and complicity, including (in view of the spirit of the Article) passive complicity.

39 During its thirty-fifth session some States reiterated that the definition should not be limited to 'public official' and should apply to all individuals under the jurisdiction of a contracting State. It was said that such an approach was preferable because of the possible incidence of acts of torture committed by those other than public officials. Others felt that such acts should be covered by existing or future national law, and that international action was primarily designed to cover situations where national action was otherwise least likely. In the end it was generally agreed that the definition of acts committed by public officials should be expanded to cover acts committed by, or at the instigation of, or with the acquiescence of a public official or any other person acting in an official capacity.⁵⁷ This wording was adopted by the Working Group in 1980.

⁵⁶ According to Art III of the IAPL draft a person is responsible for acts of torture when that person: (a) personally engages in or participates in such conduct; or (b) assists, incites, solicits, commands, or conspires with others to commit torture; or (c) being a public official, fails to take appropriate measures to prevent or suppress torture when such person has knowledge or reasonable belief that torture has been or is being committed and has authority or is in a position to take such measures.

40 During General Assembly debates in 1984, Panama expressed dissatisfaction with the definition of torture, arguing that the language limited the definition and suggesting that it did not apply to acts of torture committed by individuals, civilian organizations, or pseudo religious sects.⁵⁸ Panama and Spain felt that the prohibition should not have been limited to public officials alone since the purpose of the Convention is to eradicate any and all activities which result in torture. Spain preferred that the scope be wider and consistent with the General Assembly's 1975 Declaration on the Protection of All Persons from being subjected to Torture.

41 It is hard to say what sanctions are 'inherent in or incidental to lawful sanctions' in a particular legal system. The Working Group did not provide any criteria on how to make this determination nor did it define the terms. Even if it had been able to do so this would have given rise to serious disputes amongst States parties due to the disparity of different legal systems.

42 The starting point was the 1978 Swedish draft which qualified its application as being consistent with the UN Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners (adopted by the General Assembly in the form of a recommendation and not as internationally binding legal obligations).⁵⁹ There was considerable discussion at the Working Group's thirty-fourth session on this topic. The United Kingdom, the Federal Republic of Germany, the German Democratic Republic, Spain, and the United States proposed the deletion of this reference to the rules as they felt that their inclusion would grant the rules the character of a legally binding instrument.⁶⁰

43 In written comments the United Kingdom noted in particular that it was apparent from the last sentence of paragraph 1 of the original Swedish draft that the Convention would accept the Standard Minimum Rules as a standard and that therefore the last sentence should be deleted.⁶¹ The Federal Republic of Germany also preferred to omit the reference, arguing that the Standard Minimum Rules were 'lower ranking regulations which could be altered by non-legislative means and that could therefore directly modify the contents of the convention'.⁶² The German Democratic Republic recalled that the reference had not been common practice with the United Nations in the past and that such a reference would make the Standard Minimum Rules 'an essential criterion in a binding international instrument, thereby depriving them of their recommendatory nature'. The Spanish delegation noted that they sought the deletion of the reference as it was 'not only unnecessary (bearing in mind the concept being described) but also because the rules constitute a “recommendation” to the Government and, for technical legal reasons, it is inadmissible to bring them into a convention which, as an international treaty, gives rise to legal obligations among States Parties’. In addition the Swiss delegation noted that the Standard Minimum Rules were not rules of positive law and that it would therefore be appropriate to limit further the number of possible exceptions.⁶³ There was a Danish proposal to amend the reference to ‘... to the extent consistent with international rules for the treatment of persons deprived of their liberty’.

44 This question provoked serious concern in the Working Group’s thirty-fifth session. Some felt the reference to the Standard Minimum Rules should be reintroduced. Others suggested the inclusion of a reference to ‘existing international standards’ or using some other formulation in order to ensure that certain existing or future ‘lawful sanctions’ did not frustrate the spirit of the Convention. It was argued that the rules were limited in scope in that they dealt only with punishment relating to matters of prison discipline and that they lacked legally enforceable status in international law. One representative pointed out that the Standard Minimum Rules did not cover treatment during the period preceding actual trial and sentencing after which the detained person was designated a ‘prisoner’.⁶⁴

45 Certain States argued that while the Convention was intended to strengthen the already existing prohibition of torture in international law, it was not intended to lead to reform of the system of penal sanctions in different States and that, if that had been the intention, the Convention would have been unacceptable to a number of countries. Certain Islamic States for example did not want to be party to an instrument which deemed the imposition of certain corporal punishments under Shari’a to be a breach of the Convention.⁶⁵ It was also in the interest of these States that ‘lawful’ refer to national and not international law.

46 On the other hand there were those States who thought that this was too far reaching an exception since it might be interpreted so as to allow States to practise methods which would normally be regarded as torture, by making them lawful sanctions under its own legal system.⁶⁶ This ambiguity could mean for instance that the amputation of a hand for theft in certain Arab States following traditions of Islamic law would be lawful in one country but not in others. Many States argued for clarification whilst feeling it important to retain the clause in order to stop encroachment into national criminal law. They argued that there must be a limit beyond which sanctions provided for by national law are so cruel as to constitute torture.

47 The clause had already appeared in the 1975 Declaration. During the Declaration’s drafting process a number of participants proposed that it be made clear in the Declaration that the article would not apply to ‘a penalty or punishment imposed by a judicial tribunal in accordance with law or to a disciplinary administrative action taken under the provisions of the law and in accordance with the Standards Minimum Rules’.⁶⁷ The reference to the Standard Minimum Rules was inserted in order to make clear that certain limits should be set and that particular sanctions could not be imposed. Article 31 of the Standard Minimum Rules for instance states that ‘corporal punishment, punishment by placing in a dark cell, and all cruel inhuman or degrading punishments shall be completely prohibited as punishments for disciplinary offences’.

48 Article 1 of the original Swedish draft (which was identical to Article 1 of the 1975 Declaration) contained an exception relating to ‘pain or suffering arising only from, inherent in or incidental to, lawful sanctions to the extent consistent with the Standard Minimum Rules’. However, for reasons noted above several delegations objected to the reference to the Standard Minimum Rules and it was not included in the final text of the Convention.

49 Article II (c) of the draft submitted by the IAPL suggested alternative wording ‘... save where such conduct is in a proper execution of a lawful sanction not constituting cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment’. There were no comments made on the IAPL proposal.

50 In written comments in 1978⁶⁸ the United States accepted the concept that pain or suffering ‘arising only from, inherent in or incidental to sanctions lawfully imposed’ should be exempted from the definition of torture, arguing that it would be ‘inappropriate and politically unacceptable to use the convention as a means of reaching sanctions practised by one culture of which another culture may disapprove’.

51 France proposed a clear distinction between penalties affecting the person and honour of the criminal (peines afflictives et infamantes) which could legitimately be imposed as punishment and treatment which by causing violent physical pain or extreme mental suffering, altering the physical capacity of the victims or making the victim an object of derision or hatred, tortures the person to whom it is applied. The USSR highlighted the need to draw a clear distinction between measures that legitimately applied to offenders and forms of treatment or punishment which, because of their cruel, inhuman or particularly degrading nature, cannot be regarded as acceptable.

52 While the United States felt that it would be desirable to retain the concept that sanctions must be lawfully imposed in order to be exempted from the definition of torture, they suggested that language should be added to make the defence that a sanction was ‘lawfully imposed’ inapplicable when it was ‘imposed in flagrant disregard of accepted international standards’. The United States went on to elaborate that the negotiating history should show that ‘such standards are presently embodied in article II of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and Article 75(4) of Protocol I to the 1949 Geneva Conventions (although such standards are subject to amendments over time)’.

53 During the discussion in the 1979 Working Group some representatives made the point that the limitation clause relating to ‘pain or suffering arising only from, inherent in or incidental to lawful sanctions’ should have been deleted as too broadly worded. Several delegates stated that it was desirable to refer to ‘existing international standards’ or to use some other formulation in order to ensure that certain existing or future ‘lawful sanctions’ did not frustrate the spirit of the international Convention. However, it was widely agreed that, in the absence of specific existing international standards, it was not advisable to refer to universally acceptable principles.⁶⁹ As no agreement was possible on reference to accepted international standards, the adopted text removed the reference to the Standard Minimum Rules while maintaining a general exception for pain and suffering resulting from lawful sanctions.

54 This outcome was clearly the result of a compromise between two opposing views. During the fortieth session of the Commission the United Kingdom voiced concern over the lawful sanctions clause, arguing that in order to prevent the provisions of the Convention from being bypassed, it should not exclude pain and suffering deriving from the use of lawful sanctions. Uruguay expressed serious misgivings in relation to Article 1 and in particular to the lawful sanctions clause, asking ‘how can sanctions which might cause pain or suffering be considered lawful?’⁷⁰ The Observer for Norway voiced that his delegation would have preferred to have seen the omission of the exemption for lawful sanctions.⁷¹ Canada also complained about the exclusion of pain or suffering arising only from, inherent in or incidental to lawful sanctions.⁷² While accepting the wording of Article 1(1) as a compromise, Belgium voiced concern over the notion of ‘lawful sanction’, arguing that it was imprecise and thus constituted an even broader ‘escape clause’ than had Article 1 of the 1975 Declaration. In their written comments the Netherlands (‘the word “lawful” must be understood as referring to compatibility with both national and international law’), the United Kingdom (‘it should be understood that any such sanctions must be lawful under international as well as national law’), Italy (‘perplexed by the definition contained in Article 1(1), above all in relation to “lawful sanctions” which in any case must be understood as referring also to international law’) and the United States (‘lawful sanctions . . . must be understood to mean sanctions which are “lawful” under both national and international law’) took the view that the expression must be interpreted as reflecting commonly accepted international legal standards.⁷³

55 The result was that certain Islamic States were now offered an opening to be party to this instrument. The Working Group did not include the same exception in Article 16. During the 1981 Working Group it was suggested that a provision similar to the last sentence of paragraph 1 of Article 1 should be inserted in Article 16, in order to exclude from the scope of Article 16 suffering arising only from lawful sanctions, as had been done in the definition of torture in Article 1 of the draft Convention. That suggestion was opposed by several members who pointed out that the purpose of Article 16 was to prohibit the existence of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment and punishment, not to legalize it by having such treatment incorporated into law. The reply elicited by that interpretation of the suggestion was that the last sentence in paragraph 1 of Article 1 did not admit the legalization of torture. Attention was also drawn to the distinction between the legal connotations of the concepts of ‘punishment’ and ‘lawful sanctions’. It has been pointed out that punishment on the basis of Shari’a law could now be in conflict with Article 16 of the Convention.⁷⁴

56 The so called ‘saving clause’ in Article 1(2) outlines that the definition does not affect the protection which can be derived from other international instruments from national legislation of wider application. At the same time other international instruments or national law can never restrict the protection which individuals enjoy under the Convention. This clause was first proposed by Sweden as a draft Article 1(3) at the pre-session discussions at the thirty-fourth session with different wording: ‘. . . this Article is without prejudice to any international instrument or national legislation which does or may establish wider prohibitions.⁷⁵

57 The revised Swedish text of Article 1(3) which read ‘... this Article is without prejudice to any international instrument or national legislation which does or may contain provisions of wider application relating to the subject matter of this Convention’ was adopted by consensus and later considered by the 1981 Working Group where the wording ‘national legislation’ was changed to ‘national law’ to make it consistent with Article 16(2).

58 However, as adopted by the Commission during its thirty-seventh session in 1981, Article 1(2) read:

... this Article is without prejudice to any international instrument or national law which does or may contain provisions of wider application.

59 There was no further debate on the paragraph at the thirty-eighth Working Group session as it appears in the annex and contains ‘national legislation’ instead of ‘national law’. Boulesbaa has suggested that this may have been a mistake as it appears there had been a deliberate attempt to bring the paragraph into line with Article 16(2).

2.3 Reservations, Declarations, and Understandings

60 Some Governments made reservations relating to the definition of torture in Article 1.⁷⁶ Botswana considered itself bound by Article 1 only to the extent that ‘torture’ means the ‘torture and inhuman or degrading punishment or other treatment prohibited by Section 7 of the Constitution of the Republic of Botswana’. A similar reservation, limiting the Convention’s definition of torture to the definition enshrined in national legislation, was made by Fiji and Thailand.⁷⁷ The Lao People’s Democratic Republic noted that the term ‘torture’, as in Article 1, ‘means torture as defined in both national law and international law.’⁷⁸ Qatar even made a reservation aimed at ruling out ‘any interpretation of the provisions of the Convention that is incompatible with the precepts of Islamic law and the Islamic religion’—a very general reservation, which Qatar partly withdrew, however ‘keeping in effect a limited general reservation within the framework of Articles 1 and 16 of the Convention’.⁷⁹ The United Arab Emirates issued a controversial declaration regarding its understanding of lawful sanctions, which was strongly rejected by many European States.⁸⁰

61 The United States ratified the CAT only subject to a number of ‘understandings’ as previously advised by the Senate.⁸¹ A considerable number of these ‘understandings’, some of which go beyond a mere declaration of interpretation and, in fact, amount to a reservation, are related to the definition of torture in Article 1. For example, the United States ‘understands’ that in order to constitute torture, an act must be specifically intended to inflict severe physical or mental pain or suffering and that mental pain or suffering refers to prolonged mental harm caused by or resulting from (1) the intentional infliction or threatened infliction of severe physical pain or suffering; (2) the administration or application, or threatened administration or application, of mind altering substances or other procedures calculated to disrupt profoundly the senses or the personality; (3) the threat of imminent death; or (4) the threat that another person will imminently be subjected to death, severe physical pain or suffering, or the administration or application of mind altering substances or other procedures calculated to disrupt profoundly the senses or personality.⁸²

Furthermore, it understands the definition of torture ‘is intended to apply only to acts directed against persons in the offender’s custody or physical control’, that the term ‘acquiescence’ requires that ‘the public official, prior to the activity constituting torture, have awareness of such activity and thereafter breach his legal responsibility to intervene to prevent such activity’, and that ‘non-compliance with applicable legal procedural standards does not per se constitute torture’.⁸³ In response to these notable limitations on the scope of the definition, the Committee recommended that the United States enact a federal crime of torture in terms consistent with Article 1 and withdraw such reservations, interpretations, and understandings relating to the Convention.⁸⁴

62 A number of predominantly European Governments rightly objected to these far-reaching reservations: Denmark, Norway and Sweden objected to the reservation of Botswana as being incompatible with the object and purpose of the CAT; Portugal, Italy, Peru and Latvia objected to the reservation by Fiji with the same line of argumentation; Norway objected to the ‘declaration’ by Lao People’s Democratic Republic and Sweden objected to Thailand’s ‘declaration’, underlining that ‘it is unclear to what extent the Kingdom of Thailand considers itself bound by the obligations of the treaty.’ Finland, France, Germany, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Norway, Spain and Sweden objected to the general reservation by Qatar. With respect to the US ‘understandings’, the Government of Sweden expressed the view that they ‘do not relieve the United States of America as a party to the Convention from the responsibility to fulfil the obligations undertaken therein’. The Government of the Netherlands considered some ‘understandings’ as insufficiently clear, while others appeared to ‘restrict the scope of the definition of torture’ or ‘diminish the continuous responsibility of public officials for behaviour of their subordinates’.⁸⁵ The Committee recommended in its Concluding Observations to the US, that ‘it should give further consideration to withdrawing its interpretative understandings and reservations’,⁸⁶ especially making sure that ‘acts of psychological torture are not qualified as “prolonged mental harm”’.⁸⁷

3.1 The Definition of Torture

63 According to Article 1(1), the term ‘torture’ means ‘any act by which severe pain or suffering’ is intentionally inflicted on a person for a specific purpose. The different elements of torture—conduct, infliction of severe pain and suffering, intention, purpose, the involvement of a public official, as well as powerlessness as an important distinguishing criterion—shall be discussed subsequently.

64 There is a clear understanding, underlined by the Committee as well as the UNSRT, that the definition of torture is not only to apply to interrogation settings, but also to areas like gender-based violence, abuses in healthcare, etc.⁸⁸ Both in the Concluding Observations, as well as in the individual complaints procedure, the Committee has outlined which acts or omissions may amount to torture and how the different elements are to be interpreted.

3.1.1 Conduct

65 Whereas Article I of the IAPL draft refers to ‘any conduct’, Article 1 CAT is based in this respect on Article 1 of the Declaration and the Swedish draft which use the term ‘act’ which might give rise to a more narrow interpretation excluding omissions. Nothing in the travaux préparatoires indicates, however, that the drafters had in mind such a narrow interpretation that would exclude a conduct which intentionally deprives detainees of food, water and medical treatment from the definition of torture.

66 Already in the Greek case, which was one of the main sources of inspiration for Article 1 CAT, the European Commission on Human Rights had held that ‘the failure of the Government of Greece to provide food, water, heating in winter, proper washing facilities, clothing, medical and dental care to prisoners constitutes an “act” of torture in violation of article 3 of the ECHR’.⁸⁹ Since States have a legal duty arising from various human rights to provide detainees with adequate food, water, medical care, clothing, etc., it would indeed, as Boulesbaa suggested, be ‘absurd to conclude that the prohibition of torture in the context of Article 1 does not extend to conduct by way of omission’.⁹⁰ The Committee has equally clarified that States are responsible for both, acts and omissions.⁹¹

3.1.2 Infliction of Severe Pain and Suffering

3.1.2.1 Severity as a Distinguishing Element between Torture and Ill-Treatment?

67 Torture is a particularly grave human rights violation. During the drafting of Article 1, it was, therefore, generally agreed that only conduct which causes severe pain or suffering, whether physical or mental, can amount to torture. Otherwise this term would be used in an inflationary manner. The word ‘severe’ can be found in the 1975

Declaration, in the Swedish and IAPL drafts. Only the USSR proposed in the General Assembly to delete the word ‘severe’, but no convincing reasons were provided for this surprising amendment. On the other hand, the US and UK Governments wished even to strengthen the required intensity of the pain or suffering by adding the word ‘extremely’ before ‘severe’. Finally, the Swiss Government advocated that no distinction should be made between torture and inhuman treatment as to the respective severity of the suffering.⁹²

68 These differences of opinion, at least to some extent, are also reflected in the approaches between the European Commission and Court of Human Rights. In the Greek case, the Commission took the position that the severity of pain or suffering distinguishes inhuman treatment (including torture) from other (including degrading) treatment, whereas the purpose of such conduct constitutes the decisive distinguishing criteria between torture and inhuman treatment.⁹³ On the basis of this definition, the Commission had no problems in qualifying the five combined ‘deep interrogation techniques’ which had been used by British security forces against suspected terrorists in Northern Ireland (wall-standing in a ‘stress position’, hooding, subjection to noise, deprivation of sleep, food, and drink for long periods of time) as torture.⁹⁴

69 The UK and US position, on the other hand, seems to be inspired by the more cautious approach of the ECtHR in the Northern Ireland case. In its well-known judgment of 18 January 1978, the Court held:⁹⁵

In order to determine whether the five techniques should also be qualified as torture, the Court must have regard to the distinction, embodied in Article 3, between this notion and that of inhuman or degrading treatment. In the Court’s view, this distinction derives principally from a difference in the intensity of the suffering inflicted . . . Although the five techniques, as applied in combination, undoubtedly amounted to inhuman and degrading treatment, although their object was the extraction of confessions, the naming of others and/or information and although they were used systematically, they did not occasion suffering of the particular intensity and cruelty implied by the word torture as so understood.

In other words, the Court arrived at the conclusion that the severity and intensity of the suffering (and not the specific purpose as assumed by the Commission) was the decisive criterion for distinguishing torture, to which a ‘special stigma’ is attached (‘deliberate inhuman treatment causing very serious and cruel suffering’), from other forms of inhuman or degrading treatment.

⁹³ Opinion of the Commission of 5 November 1969 in the Greek Case (1969) (n 89) 186: ‘It is plain that there may be treatment to which all these descriptions apply, for all torture must be inhuman and degrading treatment, and inhuman treatment also degrading. The notion of inhuman treatment covers at least such treatment as deliberately causes severe suffering, mental or physical, which, in the particular situation, is unjustifiable. The word “torture” is often used to describe inhuman treatment, which has a purpose, such as the obtaining of information or confessions, or the infliction of punishment, and it is generally an aggravated form of inhuman treatment.’

⁹⁵ Ireland v United Kingdom App no 5310/71 (ECtHR, 18 January 1978) para 167. See the dissenting opinion of Matscher.

70 In its reasoning, the Court has also made reference to the last sentence of Article 1 of the 1975 Declaration, according to which torture constitutes an ‘aggravated’ and deliberate form of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment. During the drafting of Article 1 CAT, this sentence had been deleted. Similarly, the UK and US proposals to qualify the intensity as ‘extremely severe pain or suffering’ was defeated. This indicates that the UN wished to follow more the approach of the European Commission than that of the ECtHR which, moreover, had been subjected to criticism in the public and legal literature.⁹⁶

71 The fact that the UN definition of torture seems to be based on the approach of the European Commission has another important consequence: the distinction between justifiable and non-justifiable treatment causing severe suffering. According to the Commission, inhuman treatment covers at least such ‘treatment as deliberately causes severe suffering, mental or physical, which in the particular situation is unjustifiable’.⁹⁷ In other words, there may be some purposes of deliberately causing severe suffering which might nevertheless be justified and, therefore, do not constitute inhuman treatment. One might think of justified use of force by the police in the exercise of law enforcement policies (lawful arrest of a person suspected of having committed a crime, preventing a person lawfully detained from escaping, quelling a riot or insurrection, dissolution of a violent demonstration, defending a person against crime and unlawful violence, etc)⁹⁸ and of the military in the case of armed conflict. Whether such use of force can be justified or must be qualified as inhuman treatment depends on the particular circumstances of a given situation to which the principle of proportionality needs to be applied.⁹⁹ If severe pain or suffering is intentionally caused, however, by any of the purposes listed in Article 1 CAT, no justification and, consequently, no proportionality test seems to be permitted. This line of thinking also confirms that victims of torture are persons who are under the factual power of control of the person inflicting the pain or suffering and therefore in a particularly vulnerable situation.¹⁰⁰ Finally, this approach might shed some light on the understanding of the ‘lawful sanctions clause’ in Article 1.¹⁰¹

72 It follows that the *severity of pain or suffering, although constituting an essential element of the definition of torture, is not a criterion distinguishing torture from cruel and inhuman treatment.*¹⁰² In principle, every form of cruel and inhuman treatment (including torture) requires the infliction of severe pain or suffering. Only in the case of particularly humiliating treatment might the infliction of non-severe pain or suffering reach the level of degrading treatment or punishment in violation of Article 16.¹⁰³ Whether or not cruel or inhuman treatment can also be qualified as torture depends on the fulfilment of the other definition requirements in Article 1, above all whether inhuman treatment was used for any of the purposes spelt out therein.

73 The practice of the Committee partly, but not consistently confirmed the interpretation that severity is not the decisive criterion when it comes to distinguishing between torture and other forms of ill-treatment, but that the purpose and intention are relevant when undertaking this legal qualification.¹⁰⁴ In the individual complaints procedure, when finding a case of torture in accordance with the definition of Article 1, the Committee mostly does not explain exactly how it comes to the conclusion that each of the elements is fulfilled.¹⁰⁵ But it often seems to make sure, that it establishes that one of the purposes in line Article 1 is fulfilled.¹⁰⁶ For example, in Patrice Gahungu v. Burundi, the Committee concluded, that the treatment inflicted was ‘probably aimed at forcing a confession from him’¹⁰⁷ and without any additional analysis found torture in accordance with Article 1.

74 The examination of the reports submitted by Israel also provides for a good basis in assessing the Committee’s approach to the definition of torture under Article 1, as well as the distinguishing elements between the definition of torture under Article 1 and cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment under Article 16.¹⁰⁸ In 1987, the Government of Israel had appointed the Landau Commission of Inquiry, headed by former Supreme Court President, Justice Moshe Landau, to examine the General Security Service’s (GSS) methods of interrogation of terrorist suspects. The Landau Commission’s guidelines on interrogation, which were adopted by the Israeli authorities, determined that in dealing with dangerous terrorists who represent a grave threat to the State of Israel and its citizens, the use of a moderate degree of pressure, including physical pressure, in order to obtain crucial information, was unavoidable under certain circumstances.¹⁰⁹ To ensure that disproportionate pressure was not used, the Landau Commission identified several measures, such as that the use of specific measures must be weighed against the degree of anticipated danger, that the physical and psychological means of pressure must be defined and limited in advance by issuing binding directives, and that there must be strict supervision of the implementation in practice of these directives. In a second section of its report, the Landau Commission went on to detail precisely the exact forms of pressure permissible to the GSS interrogators. This section had been kept secret out of concern that, should the narrow restrictions binding the interrogators be known to the suspects undergoing questioning, the interrogation would be less effective.¹¹⁰ Already in its conclusions and recommendations regarding the initial report of Israel adopted in April 1994, the Committee considered the ‘moderate physical pressure’ permitted by the Landau Commission Report as a ‘lawful’ method of interrogation ‘completely unacceptable’ as it created ‘conditions leading to the risk of torture or cruel, or inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment’, and, ‘by retaining in secret the crucial standards of interrogation to be applied in any case, such secrecy being a further condition leading inevitably to some cases of ill-treatment’.¹¹¹

75 In its consideration of the Israeli interrogation practices, the Committee did not make a clear distinction between torture and other forms of ill-treatment which might be an indication that it does not consider the severity of pain or suffering a decisive criterion distinguishing torture from inhuman treatment.¹¹² In light of this analysis, one might conclude that the CAT Committee applies a fairly strict interpretation of both torture and other forms of ill-treatment prohibited by Article 16 CAT, which seems similar to the approach of the European Commission in the Greek and Northern Ireland cases. Since the other definition criteria of Article 1 CAT (intention and purpose of extracting information from a detainee) were clearly met, the Committee found a violation of both Articles 1 and 16.

76 However, in Sergei Kirsanov v Russian Federation, the Committee concluded that ‘the conditions in which the complainant was detained ... do not appear to have caused “severe pain and suffering” within the meaning of article 1, paragraph 1, of the Convention’.¹¹³ Subsequently, the Committee, without any other explanation, found cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment within the meaning of Article 16 and seems to have reached this conclusion because in its view the severity criterion was not fulfilled.

77 In its General Comment 2 on Article 2, the Committee has recognized that there may be a difference between torture and other forms of ill-treatment in the severity of pain and suffering but also that in any case torture does ‘not require proof of impermissible purposes’.¹¹⁴ This formulation leaves room for interpretation but seems to indicate that the Committee considers both the severity of pain and suffering as well as the purpose, as distinguishing elements. It thereby retains the concept of differing thresholds of relative severity as between ‘torture’ and ‘cruel or inhuman treatment’, but applies the CAT Convention threshold of simple ‘severe pain and suffering' to the definition of torture, and considers that the intensity of pain and suffering necessary to constitute 'cruel or inhuman treatment' must therefore be something substantially less 'severe'.¹¹⁵

Consequently, the Committee partly has confirmed in its individual complaints procedure, but also in its General Comment, that the distinguishing criterion between torture and other forms of ill-treatment is purpose, but still has not given up its understanding that there is also a difference in the severity of pain or suffering.

78 However, the difference in the severity of pain and suffering the Committee relates to in its General Comment, should instead rather be interpreted in line with the IACHR's analysis, as meaning that, due to endogenous and exogenous factors (eg duration of torture and other forms of ill-treatment, age, sex, health, context, etc), the physical and mental consequences of torture and other forms of ill-treatment can vary in intensity for every person and not in the sense that severity is the distinguishing criterion.¹¹⁶

79 The Human Rights Committee has in the meantime also confirmed purpose as the main distinguishing criterion between torture and other forms of ill-treatment: as the CCPR does not contain any definition of the concepts covered by Article 7 CCPR and as no legal consequences derive from the precise qualification of a particular practice, the Human Rights Committee has previously stipulated that it does not consider it necessary to draw sharp distinctions between the various prohibited forms of treatment or punishment.¹¹⁷ Yet, in Giri v Nepal, the Human Rights Committee argued after having stated that it follows the UNCAT definition of torture, that its 'general approach is to consider that the critical distinction between torture on the one hand, and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, on the other, will be the presence or otherwise of a relevant purposive element'.¹¹⁸

80 The legal opinion that torture and other forms of ill-treatment are to be differentiated by the purpose element and not the level of pain or suffering is also shared by the UNSRT, as well as by academia and practitioners. There is in the meantime growing international consensus 'to establish a common threshold of 'severe pain and suffering' for both torture and cruel or inhuman treatment, and to shift emphasis from the intensity of suffering to its 'purpose' and motivation'.¹¹⁹ Especially psychiatrists and traumatologists have pointed to evidence suggesting that torture, cruel, inhuman, and degrading treatment are associated with similar levels of mental pain or suffering and that a differentiation between the two based on the level of pain is not reasonable.¹²⁰

Pérez-Sales (n 119) 6, 261, has underlined: 'The distinction between torture and CIDT on the basis of the amount of pain and physical suffering has no basis': '... this definition reflects the reality of contemporary torture (as well as torture in the foreseeable future), in which interrogators use more subtle mechanisms that are not necessarily based on pain or suffering.'

3.1.2.2 Meaning of ‘severe pain and suffering’

81 As defined in the travaux préparatoires, only conduct which causes severe pain or suffering, whether physical or mental, can amount to torture. Consequently, any treatment below this threshold, will not constitute torture. In its assessment whether the severity criterion is fulfilled, the Committee usually refers to Article 1 as a whole, and states that a specific treatment will amount to severe pain or suffering, but does not go into detail, why and how it came to this conclusion.¹²¹ In Alexander Gerasimov v Kazakhstan, the complainant was inflicted several heavy blows to his kidneys and was threatened with sexual violence, before he was forced to the floor with his hands tied behind his back. Afterwards a polypropylene bag was placed over his head with which the complainant was suffocated until he bled from his nose, ears, and from the abrasions on his face, before he lost consciousness.¹²² The Committee clearly found that ‘this treatment can be characterized as severe pain and suffering’¹²³ and did not add any additional reasoning or analysis.

82 The Committee also found a violation of Article 1 of the Convention in Ntahiraja v Burundi on two accounts, without specifically explaining that the inflicted treatment amounted to severe pain and suffering. The Committee concluded torture firstly, because the complainant was violently beaten during the arrest, as well as heavily abused, humiliated, and threatened with murder during the interrogation. The Committee found a violation also on a second account the complainant was subjected to humiliations and punishments, eg by having to remove all his clothes and to sleep handcuffed on a cold cement floor. Additionally, the treatment was inflicted upon the complainant in a context where he did not have access to a judge for thirty-two days, nor to visits or the presence of a lawyer or medical care. The Committee concluded that the humiliations and extreme conditions of detention added to the abuse and the apparent lack of medical care following these abuses also amount to torture in accordance with article 1 of the Convention.¹²⁴

83 The Committee has also clearly recognized rape and other forms of gender-based violence as torture. In the case CT and KM v Sweden, the Committee found that rape committed by public officials constitutes torture, thereby acknowledging the severity of pain and suffering caused.¹²⁵

84 The Committee has also found that when a complainant was brutally beaten with blows to the face and buttocks this constitutes a treatment which amounts to torture.¹²⁶ Other torture methods identified for example in the inquiry procedure regarding Mexico included handcuffing behind the back, blindfolding, deprivation of sleep, food, water and using the bathroom, mock executions, electric shocks, blows to various parts of the body, above all the ears, placing of plastic bags over the head and tightened around the neck to cause a sensation of asphyxiation, and pouring of water containing irritants such as carbonic acid or chilli powder into the mouth and/or nose while pressure is applied to the victim's stomach.¹²⁷ In one prison, the Committee also considered certain punishments and other forms of ill-treatment, such as handcuffing and shackling for days at a time, and putting inmates undressed in a freezing, air-conditioned room for days at a time as torture.¹²⁸

85 Under the inquiry procedure with respect to Turkey, the Committee found in 1992, that solitary confinement in so-called 'coffins', ie inadequately ventilated cells of 60 by 80 centimetres, without light, where the detainee could only stand or crouch, constituted 'a kind of torture'.¹²⁹ Similarly, disciplinary confinement in punishment cells in Bolivia of the kind known as 'el bote' (meaning 'the can', being cold and damp cells measuring 2m by 1.5m, without any beds and sanitation) was, in the Committee's view, tantamount to torture as well.¹³⁰

86 In all of these cases, the Committee did not separately provide any analysis regarding the different elements being fulfilled, but since the Committee found torture, one may conclude that the treatments outlined were found to cause severe pain or suffering, with the other elements of torture in line with Article 1 being equally fulfilled.

87 The Committee also concluded, without any more detailed analysis, that 'prolonged detention [3.5 months and 1 month], in a 'temporary confinement ward' without bedding or toiletry items, table, toilet, sink, showers seldom allowed and then only with cold water, no walks outside the cell, insects in the cell, light always being on, and no ventilation, as well as food once a day 'do not appear to have caused "severe pain and suffering" within the meaning of article 1'.¹³¹

88 In the inquiry proceedings on Peru, the Committee found that the prison conditions in the El Callao naval base, where six prominent guerrilla leaders served sentences between thirty years and life imprisonment in complete solitary confinement, amounted to torture. The prisoners were kept for twenty-three hours a day in isolation cells which were totally soundproofed against outside noise. For one hour a day they had the right to go outside, albeit alone, to a small yard surrounded by high walls. Once a month they were allowed visits by close family members for half an hour. In the view of the Committee, this sensorial deprivation and the almost total prohibition of communication caused 'persistent and unjustified suffering which amounts to torture'.¹³² The conditions of detention at the maximum security prisons at Challapalca and Yanamayo, situated in the Andes of southern Peru at a height of more than 4,500 metres above sea level, with no electricity and drinking water and temperatures of minus 10° or 15° C without heating, on the other hand, were however qualified as 'only' amounting to cruel and inhuman treatment and punishment.¹³³ Finally, in a number of places of detention under the authority of the Ministry of Interior, the Committee found that arrested persons may be detained there for periods of up to thirty-five days. In certain cases, persons under interrogation were forced to spend the night in the interrogation rooms lying on the floor and handcuffed. Although the precise conditions in these places of detention are not revealed in the summary account, the Committee members expressed the view that a long period of detention in the cells of the detention places referred to above, ie two weeks, amounts to inhuman and degrading treatment. Longer periods of detention in those cells amount to torture. Moreover, the practice of forcing persons under interrogation to spend the night in the interrogation rooms lying handcuffed on the floor also amounts to torture.¹³⁴

No arguments have been developed for this surprising and inconsistent legal qualification. Why does one night lying handcuffed on the floor of an interrogation room per se amount to torture whereas spending many months in a maximum security prison at an altitude of 4,500 metres without heating and electricity and with freezing temperatures amount 'only' to cruel and inhuman treatment? Why does the length of detention (less or more than two weeks) change the qualification from inhuman and degrading treatment to torture? Is it the severity of pain and suffering or the purpose that changes?

89 The Committee thus seems to decide based on the specific circumstances of each case, whether an inflicted treatment amounts to 'severe pain and suffering' in line with Article 1, without providing any detailed analysis or assessment, why it would find or not find that a treatment fulfils the legal qualification.¹³⁵ Sometimes this assessment does not seem to be fully consistent.

90 It is important to underline that the level of pain and suffering is relative and may differ subjectively.¹³⁶ As the IACHR has stipulated, due to endogenous and exogenous factors (eg duration of torture and other forms of ill-treatment, age, sex, health, context, etc), the physical and mental consequences of torture and other forms of ill-treatment can vary in intensity for every person.¹³⁷

91 'Severe pain and suffering' relates to physical and mental suffering equally, with psychological torture and other forms of ill-treatment being 'by no means less severe than physical abuse'.¹³⁸ This is very important, as mental suffering of the same intensity than physical pain and suffering can be inflicted without actual physical contact.¹³⁹ Consequently, the Committee has confirmed that acts which may lead to severe mental suffering, such as sleep deprivation, sensory deprivation, or manipulation techniques, may amount to torture, because they fulfil the severity criterion outlined in Article 1.¹⁴⁰ Referring to the 2002 authorization of the use of certain interrogation techniques that have resulted in the death of some detainees during interrogation, the Committee concluded that the United States should rescind any interrogation technique, including methods involving sexual humiliation, 'waterboarding', 'short shackling', and using dogs to induce fear, that constitute torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, in all places of detention under its de facto effective control, in order to comply with its obligations under the Convention.¹⁴¹ In relation to the Republic of Korea, the Committee noted that the sleep deprivation practised on suspects amounted to torture in many cases and was unacceptable.¹⁴²

92 The Human Rights Committee has held that the ‘enhanced interrogation techniques’ constitute a violation of Article 7, but has not clarified whether it holds that they amount to torture or other ill-treatment.¹⁴³

93 The Committee has made clear that acts of psychological torture should not be limited to ‘prolonged mental harm’ as set out in the US understandings lodged at the time of ratification of the Convention, but constitute a wider category of acts, which cause severe mental suffering, irrespective of their prolongation or its duration.¹⁴⁴ Thus, not only systematic or prolonged conduct can inflict severe pain and suffering, but also a single act which causes severe mental suffering fulfils the criterion outlined in Article 1.¹⁴⁵ Both the Committee against Torture and the Human Rights Committee have found that threats, in particular against the life of a person, amount to torture, because of the severe pain and suffering inflicted and fulfilment of the other elements of Article 1.¹⁴⁶ The Committee also found that leading persons to a river bank and threatening them with drowning if not confessing or pointing a gun to the head of the person, constitutes torture, thereby acknowledging the severe pain and suffering inflicted.¹⁴⁷

94 The Committee has found repeatedly, that national definitions of torture not encompassing mental pain or suffering are in breach of the Convention.¹⁴⁸

95 In its Concluding Observations on Sri Lanka, the Committee has also pointed out that the definition in the Sri Lankan Criminal Code, restricting torture to ‘any act which causes severe pain, whether physical or mental’ and thus omitting ‘suffering’, is not sufficient, as it does not cover acts that are not violent per se, but nevertheless inflict suffering.¹⁴⁹

96 Also dehumanizing practices such as enforced disappearance, which can have long-lasting and very damaging consequences for the disappeared persons, as well as for family and loved ones, may qualify as causing severe pain and suffering under Article 1.¹⁵⁰ The Committee found ‘regrettable’ the view of the United States that involvement in enforced disappearances did not constitute a form of torture.¹⁵¹ It reiterated its view that enforced disappearance constitutes torture within the meaning of Article 1 in the case

97 Every instance of secret detention amounts to enforced disappearance.¹⁵⁵ Consequently, in the case HB v Algeria, the Committee held that the secret detention of the complainant, inflicted humiliation, and inhumane conditions of detention constituted a violation of Article 1 of the Convention.¹⁵⁶

98 In the case of Megreisi v Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, the Human Rights Committee established that ‘incommunicado’ detention in a secret location for more than three years per se constitutes torture and cruel and inhuman treatment.¹⁵⁷

99 Regarding the meaning of ‘severity’, the UNSRT has clarified that severity ‘does not have to be equivalent in intensity to the pain accompanying serious physical injury, such as organ failure, impairment of bodily functions or even death’, as suggested by the so-called ‘torture memos’ under the Bush administration in the US.¹⁵⁸ The memorandum drafted by Jay S Bybee in 2002 suggested that ‘severe’ means that ‘the pain or suffering must be of such a high level of intensity that the pain is difficult for the subject to endure’, as well as ‘associated with a sufficiently serious physical injury, such as death, organ failure, or serious impairment of body functions’.¹⁵⁹ The memorandum was rescinded after the Abu Ghraib scandal in June 2004 and replaced by the ‘Levin memorandum’, which explicitly rejected the Bybee memorandum’s assertions.¹⁶⁰ The UNSRT has also underlined that while injuries might constitute an aggravating factor, torture should never be reduced to its consequences, especially since many torture methods nowadays are designed not to leave any marks.¹⁶¹ conditions¹⁶² and as a consequence, the understanding of what constitutes severe pain and suffering falling under the definition of torture has changed over time.

3.1.3 Intention

101 Article 1 requires that severe pain or suffering must be intentionally inflicted on the victim in order to qualify as torture. Purely negligent conduct, therefore, can never be considered as torture. When a detainee is, for example, forgotten by the prison guards and slowly starves to death, such conduct certainly produces severe pain and suffering, but it lacks intention and purpose and, therefore, can ‘only’ be qualified as cruel and/or inhuman treatment. During the drafting, the United States wished to make this requirement stronger by referring to ‘deliberately and maliciously’ inflicting extremely severe pain or suffering.¹⁶³ Since the US proposal was not adopted, the US Government ratified the Convention with the explicit ‘understanding’ that, ‘in order to constitute torture, an act must be specifically intended to inflict severe physical or mental pain or suffering’.¹⁶⁴ This interpretation does, however, not seem to go beyond the requirement of intention as spelt out in the text of Article 1.

102 The intention must be directed at the conduct of inflicting severe pain or suffering as well as at the purpose to be achieved by such conduct. This follows from the clear wording of Article 1 (‘is intentionally inflicted on a person for such purposes as’). If severe pain or suffering is inflicted, for instance, in the course of a fully justified medical treatment, such conduct cannot constitute torture as it lacks both a purpose enumerated in Article 1 and the intention in relation to such a purpose.¹⁶⁵

103 A UK proposal that the pain must not only be inflicted intentionally, but also systematically, was not adopted by the Working Group.¹⁶⁶ It follows that even single, isolated acts can be considered to constitute torture if they fulfil the other definition criteria.¹⁶⁷

104 The Committee has underlined in its General Comment on Article 2 that the elements of intent and purpose do not involve a subjective inquiry into the motivation of the perpetrators, but there must rather be ‘objective determinations under the circumstances’.¹⁶⁸ This means that there must not be direct evidence on the mental state of the perpetrator, but the conclusion that intent was given in the specific case can be inferred from facts and circumstances of the case, that demonstrate that pain and suffering was inflicted knowingly for a purpose stipulated in Article 1.¹⁶⁹ In practice, the Committee very often simply states that a certain conduct was intentional, but it has also added—again without any detailed explanation—why it came to that conclusion: ‘The Committee observes that the treatment inflicted on the complainant was intentional, since it occurred while he was in the hands of agents of the State party.’¹⁷⁰ This suggests, that when a detainee is ill-treated at the hands of the State party, it can be inferred from the circumstances of the case, that pain and suffering was inflicted knowingly for a purpose in line with Article 1.

105 The notorious ‘torture memos’¹⁷¹ in the US ‘War on Terror’ also tried to restrict the definition of torture by arguing that a defendant must act with specific intent to inflict severe pain and ‘the infliction of such pain must be the defendant’s precise objective’.¹⁷² From this, the memo concluded that ‘even if the defendant knows that severe pain will result from his actions, if causing such harm is not his objective, he lacks the requisite specific intent even though the defendant did not act in good faith.’ The memorandum has been rescinded and the legal view strongly rejected.¹⁷³ From the text and the travaux préparatoires for the Convention one can conclude that the element of intent for the definition of torture does not require that the perpetrator’s purpose is the causing of pain or suffering. The perpetrator must intentionally, ie knowingly, not negligently or recklessly, inflict pain or suffering and this pain must be inflicted for one of the purposes prohibited under the Convention. This means that the perpetrator must not act with the specific intent to inflict severe pain and suffering.¹⁷⁴ As pain and suffering is subjective and levels of pain and suffering for the same treatment might differ from person to person, it cannot be a requirement that intention encompasses the infliction of severe pain and suffering, but it is sufficient that a perpetrator intended the conduct in which he consequently inflicted severe pain or suffering and at least took into consideration that the treatment could inflict pain or suffering.¹⁷⁵ It is therefore the specific purpose, as outlined in Article 1’s definition of torture, that determines whether an act or an omission constitute torture, making torture a specific intent crime.¹⁷⁶

106 If torture is inflicted on a person by a private individual with the acquiescence of a public official, the question arises whether the requirement of intention applies to the private perpetrator or to the public official or both.¹⁷⁷

3.1.4 Purpose

107 As stated above, the requirement of a specific purpose seems to be the most decisive criterion which distinguishes torture from cruel or inhuman treatment.¹⁷⁸ That ill-treatment can only amount to torture if it serves a specific purpose seemed to be uncontroversial during the drafting of Article 1. Opinions differed, however, as to the precise list of purposes enumerated therein.¹⁷⁹ Switzerland wished to add non-therapeutic medical or scientific experiments, Portugal the use of psychiatry for the purpose of prolonging the confinement of a person, and the UK delegation wished to include ‘gratuitous torture’ and to delete discrimination as a specific purpose. While most delegations agreed that the list of purposes in Article 1 is meant to be indicative rather than exhaustive, the US proposal that any purposes or motives regardless of whether or not they were mentioned in Article 1 would suffice was not adopted by the General Assembly.

108 Article 2 ACHR has a wider application by adding the words ‘or for any other purpose’. A similar proposal to add such a clause to the definition in the 1975 UN Declaration had been defeated,¹⁸⁰ and these words are also missing in Article 1 CAT despite efforts of the US and other delegations to broaden the definition. A grammatical interpretation as well as the travaux préparatoires, therefore, lead to the conclusion that the words ‘for such purposes as’ must be understood in a narrow sense. Not every purpose is sufficient but only a purpose which has ‘something in common with the purposes expressly listed’.¹⁸¹

109 What is the common denominator of the purposes listed in Article 1? They include

- extracting a confession
- obtaining from the victim or a third person information;
- punishment;
- intimidation and coercion;
- discrimination.

110 In its Concluding Observations, the Committee has repeatedly asked States parties to make sure their national legislation is in line with the Convention’s Article 1. The Committee criticized eg the Chinese legislation, as it does not include any other purposes than extracting confessions.¹⁸² In relation to several States parties, the Committee expressed its concern, that the purpose of discrimination was not included in the definition of torture¹⁸³ or that the Criminal Code included a list of specific discrimination grounds (political views, sexual orientation) but not ‘any reason based on discrimination of any kind’.¹⁸⁴

111 As Burgers and Danelius rightly observe, the purposes listed in Article 1 are not necessarily illegitimate, but are directly linked to ‘the interests or policies of the State and its organs’.¹⁸⁵ While the purpose of the perpetrator needs to be linked to the purposes listed, the SRT has also argued that the relatively broad phrasing of the listed purposes means that ‘it is difficult to envisage a realistic scenario of purposeful ill-treatment against a powerless person’¹⁸⁶ which would not be encompassed by the definition of Article 1, if severe pain or suffering is inflicted.

112 In the individual complaints procedure, the Committee normally makes sure to indicate which of the purposes in Article 1 it deems to be fulfilled. In the case Patrice Gahungu v. Burundi, the Committee concluded that the treatment inflicted was ‘probably aimed at forcing a confession from him’¹⁸⁷ and consequently found torture in accordance with Article 1. In EN v Burundi, the State party argued that the act of severe beatings committed by police officers in a police station after arrest cannot be classified as torture because the Burundian Criminal Code requires that acts of torture must be committed to obtain information or a confession.¹⁸⁸ The Committee concluded that the beating was most likely undertaken in order to punish him for an act he was thought to have committed. In both of the cases the Committee seems to have followed the approach stipulated in its General Comment, namely that the elements of intent and purpose do not involve a subjective inquiry into the motivation of the perpetrators, but there must instead be ‘objective determinations under the circumstances’.¹⁸⁹

113 The Committee has recognized that in comparison to torture, other forms of ill-treatment do ‘not require proof of impermissible purposes’ and therefore has acknowledged purpose as a decisive criterion to distinguish torture from other forms of ill-treatment.¹⁹⁰ Thus the definition of torture does not necessarily depend on a subjectively verified purpose or intensity of the inflicted pain or suffering, but on the intentionality and purposefulness of that infliction in combination with the powerlessness of the victim.¹⁹¹

3.1.5 Powerlessness

114 All purposes listed in Article 1 as well as the travaux préparatoires of both the Declaration and the Convention seem to refer to a situation in which the victim of torture is a detainee or a person ‘at least under the factual power or control of the person inflicting the pain or suffering’,¹⁹² and where the perpetrator uses this unequal and powerful situation to achieve a certain effect, such as the extraction of information, intimidation, or punishment. The ‘ideal’ environment for torture is prolonged incommunicado detention in a secret place, ie a situation in which the victim is totally subordinated to the will and power of the torturer. Such a situation of powerlessness strongly resembles the condition of slavery, and both torture and slavery can be described as most direct and brutal attacks on the core of human dignity and personality. This link between the right to human dignity and the absolute prohibition of torture and slavery has been established most convincingly in Article 5 ACHPR.¹⁹³

115 The UNSRT has confirmed that powerlessness means that ‘someone is overpowered, in other words, has come under the direct physical or equivalent control of the

All forms of exploitation and degradation of man particularly slavery, slave trade, torture, cruel, inhuman or degrading punishment and treatment shall be prohibited.’ See also Chapter I of the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights on human dignity. In the State reporting procedure under the CAT the Committee has also asked Mauritania to criminalize slavery and to include an adequate definition, covering all forms of slavery in its legislation. See CAT, ‘Concluding Observations: Mauritania’ (2013) UN Doc CAT/C/MRT/CO/1, para 21.

perpetrator and has lost the capacity to resist or escape the infliction of pain or suffering'.¹⁹⁴ This will usually be the case in a situation of detention as well as arrest, eg when the victim is handcuffed or lying on the street without resisting his or her arrest or any other similar situation, in which the victim is under the direct control of another person.¹⁹⁵

116 The Committee has not only emphasized that the States parties' obligations to prohibit, prevent, and redress torture extend 'to all contexts of custody and control',¹⁹⁶ but pointed out that States are under a special obligation to take effective measures to prevent torture and ensure that persons deprived of their liberty can exercise the rights enshrined in the Convention, since they bear a special responsibility owing to the extent of the control that prison authorities exercise over such persons. States parties must therefore take the necessary steps to prevent individuals from inflicting acts of torture on persons under their control.¹⁹⁷

It has thereby explicitly underlined that a person deprived of liberty is especially vulnerable due to the extent of control that this person is subjected to.

117 The Committee has found torture also outside a detention context, while confirming the element of powerlessness. In VL v Switzerland, the Committee held that 'the complainant was clearly under the physical control of the police even though the acts concerned were perpetrated outside formal detention facilities'.¹⁹⁸ After having found that severe pain and suffering was inflicted on the victim, for purposes such as interrogation, intimidation, and punishment, as well as humiliation and discrimination based on gender, the Committee concluded that the sexual abuse by the police amounted to torture, even though it was carried 'outside formal detention facilities'.¹⁹⁹ The Committee thereby acknowledged that rape by public officials constitutes torture, even if it does not happen in a context of detention. What is relevant, therefore, is the powerlessness of the victim.²⁰⁰

118 In the case X v Burundi, the Committee stipulated regarding the circumstances of the case, that the complainant was arrested by State officials, who beat and kicked him in the chest, ribs, back, and head while pointing a weapon at his head.²⁰¹ The complainant was tied up 'with his hands behind his back, having been completely overpowered by the State officials'²⁰² when this treatment was inflicted. While the State party argued that injuries happened to the complainant because he resisted to the law enforcement officials, the Committee concluded that 'the injuries occurred while the claimant was under the control of the State party's authorities'.²⁰³ Consequently, the Committee concluded that the respective acts constituted torture.

119 Similar findings were made by the IACHR in Rosendo Cantú et al v Mexico,²⁰⁴ the Inter American Commission in Gayle v Jamaica,²⁰⁵ as well as by the ECtHR in Cestaro v Italy and Bartese Gallo and Others v Italy.²⁰⁶ In all of these cases, courts found that victims were subjected to severe pain and suffering, while being under the direct control of the State party, even though that control was exercised outside of a detention context.

120 It follows that torture, as the most serious violation of the human right to personal integrity, presupposes a situation of powerlessness of the victim which usually, but not only, means deprivation of personal liberty.²⁰⁷ The Convention does not generally and absolutely prohibit the intentional infliction of severe pain or suffering by a public official. If a police officer, for example, deliberately shoots into the legs of a person in order to effect a lawful arrest or prevent the escape of a person lawfully detained, or uses physical force with truncheons, pepper spray, and other weapons for the purpose of breaking up an unlawful demonstration or quelling a riot, he or she might intentionally inflict severe pain on the person concerned. Whether the use of force amounts to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment depends on the proportionality of the force applied in relation to the lawful goal to be achieved. As soon as the person is, however, arrested or in a similar way under the direct power or control of the police officer the further use of physical force for the purpose of intimidation, punishment or discrimination will be qualified as torture.

121 Even though the prohibition of both torture and other forms of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment are laid down in international human rights law as absolute human rights, the principle of proportionality nevertheless might apply as we have seen in the examples cited above. But it only applies for the purpose of defining the scope of application of the right not to be subjected to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment, and not for the right not to be subjected to torture. If severe physical or mental pain or suffering is intentionally inflicted for lawful purposes outside the scope of Article 1 in a proportional manner, then this conduct is a justified use of force and by definition does not amount to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment. If the use of force is not absolutely necessary for achieving such purpose, the treatment might be qualified as degrading, inhuman, or cruel.²⁰⁸ If the same force is applied in a situation of powerlessness for any of the purposes listed in Article 1 and leads to severe pain or suffering, it amounts to torture and can never be justified by applying the principle of proportionality, not even in the ‘ticking time bomb’ scenario.²⁰⁹ The powerlessness of the victim is the essential criterion which the drafters of the Convention had in mind when they introduced the legal distinction between torture and other forms of ill-treatment.²¹⁰

122 Severe pain or suffering only constitutes torture in the understanding of the Convention if it is ‘inflicted by or at the instigation of or with the consent or acquiescence of a public official or other person acting in an official capacity’. The formulation in the 1975 Declaration and the original Swedish draft (‘by or at the instigation of a public official’) reflects the traditional view that States can only be held accountable for human rights violations committed by State actors. Since the main purpose of the Convention was to require States parties to use domestic criminal law for the purpose of punishing perpetrators of torture, several Governments, such as France, Barbados, Panama, and Spain, advocated an extension of the definition covering also private individuals.²¹¹ Germany did not go as far but wished to include also non-State actors who exercise authority over others and whose authority is comparable to Government authority. Since other Governments, including the United States, United Kingdom, Morocco, and Austria, insisted on a traditional State-centred definition, the Working Group finally agreed on a US compromise proposal which extended State responsibility to the consent or acquiescence of a public official. Since the delegations could not agree on a definition of the term ‘public official’, the Austrian proposal to add the phrase ‘or other person acting in an official capacity’ was adopted.

3.1.6.1 Meaning of ‘public official’

123 As to the definition of public official itself, the Committee has repeatedly criticized in its Concluding Observations that States have incorporated a definition that may not cover all public officials and persons acting in an official capacity.²¹² The Committee for example expressed its concern regarding the fact that members of the armed forces are not included as public officials in the definition of torture in the Honduran Criminal Code.²¹³ While there exists a similar provision in the Honduran Military Code, this however carries much lower sanctions. In the State reporting procedure regarding Ethiopia, the Committee criticized that the definition of torture is much narrower than under the Convention, inter alia only referring to ‘acts committed in the performance of duties by public servants charged with the arrest, custody, supervision, escort or interrogation of a person under suspicion, arrest, detention or summoned to appear before a court or serving a sentence'.²¹⁴ Regarding the reports of Cap Verde and Macao, the Committee criticized that torture is limited to acts that are committed by persons vested with specific public functions listed in the article or persons usurping those functions.²¹⁵ It follows that the Committee interprets the term 'public official' in a broad sense.

124 In the individual complaints procedure, the Committee has outlined how it deals with the involvement of public officials, when States argue that its representatives are not responsible for torturing or ill-treating individuals: in EN v Burundi, the State party argued that actions of the police were unplanned, police officers were not acting on orders, and following from this, the injuries inflicted could not be classified as torture.²¹⁶ The Committee observed that the persons beating and interrogating the complainant were 'uniformed police officers armed with rifles and belts. Furthermore, the complainant was severely beaten for two hours by police officers within the police station itself.'²¹⁷ Consequently, the Committee concluded that the acts were committed by 'agents of the State party acting in an official capacity'²¹⁸ and with the other criteria fulfilled as well, found an act of torture. Similarly, in the case Oleg Evloev v Kazakhstan, the State party did not contest the physical injuries of the complainant but argued, that there was no involvement by officials in the infliction of these injuries.²¹⁹ The Committee concluded that the complainant was placed in pretrial investigation at the premises of the Ministry of Internal Affairs in Astana at the time his injuries were incurred. Under these circumstances, the State party should be presumed liable for the harm caused to the complainant unless it provides a compelling alternative explanation. In the present case, the State party provided no such explanation and thus the Committee must conclude that the investigating officers are responsible for the complainant's injuries.²²⁰

It is thus made clear by the Committee that a State party is responsible for the acts committed by its public officials, such as police, for any acts of ill-treatment that happen within its premises and that such acts amount to torture, as soon as the other elements of Article 1 are fulfilled as well.

3.1.6.2 Meaning of 'other person acting in an official capacity'

125 The term 'other person acting in an official capacity' is clearly broader than just State officials. It was inserted on the proposal of Austria in order to meet the concerns of the Federal Republic of Germany that certain non-State actors whose authority is comparable to governmental authority should also be held accountable.²²¹ These de facto authorities seem to be similar to those 'political organizations' which, according to Article 7(2)(i) ICC Statute, can be held accountable for the crime of enforced disappearance before the ICC. One might think of rebel, guerrilla, or insurgent groups who exercise de facto authority in certain regions or of warring factions in so-called 'failing States'.

126 In the case of Elmi v Australia, the Committee had to decide whether the forced return of a Somali national belonging to the Shikal clan to Somalia, where he was at a substantial risk of being subjected to torture by the ruling Hawiye clan, constituted a violation of the prohibition of refoulement pursuant to Article 3. The Committee found a violation of Article 3 and explicitly rejected the argument of the Australian Government that the acts of torture the applicant feared he would be subjected to in Somalia would not fall within the definition of torture set out in Article 1. The Committee has noted that since Somalia has been without a central Government for years and a number of warring factions de facto exercise prerogatives that would normally be practised by legitimate Governments, the members of these factions could fall within the phrase ‘public officials or other persons acting in an official capacity’ contained in Article 1, according to the Committee.²²²

127 The Committee has repeatedly criticized States parties that have not criminalized torture inflicted by, or at the instigation of, or with the consent or acquiescence of a public official or other person acting in an official capacity.²²³ In its Concluding Observations to Kazakhstan the Committee has expressed its concern that the definition does not encompass acts of torture committed by any ‘other person acting in an official capacity’ and has held that this might lead to impunity.²²⁴ In the Concluding Observations to Morocco, the Committee criticized that the definition of torture included in the Criminal Code does not encompass complicity or explicit or tacit consent of law enforcement, security staff, or any other person acting in an official capacity.²²⁵ The Committee voiced its concern regarding Chinese legislation that restricts the prohibition of torture to the actions of judicial officers and officers of an institution of confinement, but does not cover acts by ‘other persons acting in an official capacity’, including those acts that result from instigation, consent, or acquiescence of a public official.²²⁶

3.1.6.3 Meaning of ‘instigation’, ‘consent’, and ‘acquiescence’

128 The term ‘instigation’ means incitement, inducement, or solicitation and as such requires the direct or indirect involvement and participation of a public official.²²⁷ The terms ‘consent or acquiescence’ are, however, much broader and in fact can be interpreted to cover a wide range of actions committed by private persons if the State in some way or another permits such activities to continue.²²⁸ The Committee has underlined that States parties have an obligation to adopt effective measures to prevent ‘public authorities and other persons acting in an official capacity from directly committing, instigating, inciting, encouraging, acquiescing in or otherwise participating or being complicit in acts of torture’.²²⁹

129 In the US ‘understanding’, the term ‘acquiescence’ requires that ‘the public official, prior to the activity constituting torture, have awareness of such activity and thereafter breach his legal responsibility to intervene to prevent such activity'.²³⁰ A typical example of torture by acquiescence would be the outsourcing of interrogations to private contractors when the competent State officials know or should know that such private security companies might resort to torture practices.

130 The Committee in the meantime has very clearly outlined that States bear responsibility not only for the acts and omissions of their officials, but also for others, such as agents, private contractors, and others acting in official capacity or on behalf of the State, in conjunction with the State under its direction or control, or otherwise under colour of law.²³¹ The Committee has also clarified that in case of privately run or owned detention centres, the staff is acting in official capacity and carrying out a State function, with State officials having the obligation to monitor as well as taking effective measures to prevent torture and ill-treatment. The Committee has equally underlined that while the States parties' obligations extend to all contexts of custody and control, this does not only include prisons, but also hospitals, schools, institutions taking care of children, aged, and mentally-ill or disabled persons, military services and 'other institutions as well as contexts where the failure of the State to intervene encourages and enhances the danger of privately inflicted harm'.²³²

131 As in other cases of State obligations to protect human rights against interference by private persons, the due diligence test as developed by the Inter-American Court of Human Rights in cases of enforced disappearances might be applied.²³³ On the due diligence test, the Committee has stated, that if acts of torture or ill-treatment are being committed by non-State officials or private actors and State authorities or others acting in official capacity or under the colour of law know or have reasonable grounds to believe that these are taking place and they do not exercise due diligence to prevent, investigate, prosecute, and punish these non-State officials or private actors in accordance with the Convention, the State as well as its officials will be responsible for the committed acts.²³⁴ The Committee has applied this principle to States parties' not preventing and protecting victims from gender-based violence, including rape, FGM, trafficking, and domestic violence. It thereby also reiterates that these practices may amount to torture.²³⁵

132 Thus, one may conclude that a State is responsible for acts or omissions of public officials and other persons acting in an official capacity, be it for directly committing, instigating, inciting, encouraging, acquiescing in, or otherwise participating or being complicit in torture. Especially from the acquiescence element, one may derive an important responsibility for States, when torture is committed by non-State actors: States in such cases have to exercise due diligence to prevent, investigate, and punish such acts. Consequently, the Committee also emphasized that rape and violence committed by non-State actors may equally amount to torture if the State fails to exercise due diligence to 'intervene to stop, sanction and provide remedies to victims of torture'.²³⁶

133 Article 1 contains a legal definition of torture, which needs to be applied in conjunction with State obligations applicable to torture. The CAT lacks a general provision prohibiting torture or granting an individual human right not to be subjected to torture and other forms of ill-treatment, similar to Article 7 CCPR, Article 3 ECHR, Article 5 ACHR, or Article 5 ACHPR.²³⁷ The CAT seems to presuppose such a human right as part of customary international law. As spelt out in the Preamble, the States parties to the CAT, ‘desiring to make more effective the struggle against torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment throughout the world’, merely intended to establish additional and specific State obligations to prevent torture and ill-treatment as well as to punish torture.²³⁸

134 Because of the lack of a provision prohibiting torture in Article 1, it has previously—and rightly—been argued that Article 1 does not contain a specific State obligation and that an individual wishing to complain against having been subjected to torture, must prove that the State party concerned has failed to ‘take effective legislative, administrative, judicial or other measures to prevent acts of torture in any territory under its jurisdiction’, as spelt out in Article 2(1).²³⁹ In the meantime, the Committee has repeatedly found violations of Article 1 in the individual complaints procedure.²⁴⁰ There are still a few cases where the Committee found a violation of Article 2(1) read in conjunction with Article 1, but not of Article 1.²⁴¹ In other cases, the Committee found a violation of Article 1 and not of Article 2.²⁴²

135 Not only are there obviously inconsistencies in the Committee’s jurisprudence, but from a legal perspective it is also not understandable how a legal definition is interpreted in a way so as to constitute an obligation. This means that legally it is not possible to find a violation of a provision that is nothing but a definition. Thus the correct way would be, as was also recently confirmed by the Committee, to find a violation of Article 2 (1) in conjunction with Article 1.²⁴³

3.3 Lawful Sanctions

136 The last sentence of Article 1(1) specifies that the definition of torture ‘does not include pain or suffering arising only from, inherent in or incidental to lawful sanctions’. This clause was already the most controversial element of the definition during the drafting of Article 1²⁴⁴ and remains highly controversial today.²⁴⁵ It derives from the 1975 UN Declaration which, however, allows lawful sanctions as an exception to torture only ‘to the extent consistent with the Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners’. In the Declaration, the lawful sanctions clause accordingly was meant to apply to certain disciplinary measures against prisoners below the threshold of corporal punishment, placing a detainee in a dark cell, and similar measures prohibited by the Standard Minimum Rules. One example which was sometimes cited was to put a prisoner for some time into solitary confinement.²⁴⁶

137 The reference to the Standard Minimum Rules was deleted from Article 1 CAT only on the ground that certain Governments, notably from Western Europe, did not wish to include in a binding treaty a reference to a non-binding soft law instrument. As soon as these Governments realized that the deletion of the reference to the Standard Minimum Rules would in fact open the door to a far-reaching escape clause which would even exempt serious types of corporal punishment provided for in the criminal law of Islamic States from the prohibition of torture, they tried to replace it by another limitation referring to binding international standards. The United States, for instance, proposed that lawful sanctions ‘imposed in flagrant disregard of accepted international standards’ would not be permitted. As the drafters could not reach agreement on defining these ‘accepted international standards’, many Governments, including the United Kingdom, Uruguay, Norway, Canada and Belgium, unsuccessfully tried to delete the clause altogether. Others insisted in their written comments that the term ‘lawful sanctions’ must be interpreted to refer both to domestic and international law.²⁴⁷ At the time of ratification, the Governments of Luxembourg and the Netherlands reiterated this legal opinion in specific declarations of interpretation. The respective ‘understanding’ of the US Government is more ambiguous. On the one hand, the United States understands that the term ‘sanctions’ includes ‘judicially-imposed sanctions and other enforcement actions authorized by United States law or by judicial interpretation of such law’; on the other hand, the United States understands ‘that a State Party could not through its domestic sanctions defeat the object and purpose of the Convention to prohibit torture’.²⁴⁸

138 The Committee has originally been cautious in the reporting procedure to avoid any confrontation with Governments on the interpretation of the lawful sanctions clause, but has made it clear in recent years that it does not accept corporal punishments as covered by the lawful sanctions clause.²⁴⁹ When the Swiss representative in 1990 stressed that his Government considered as lawful sanctions only such punishments as were permitted under national and international law, which clearly excluded a punishment such as the severing of limbs, Committee members remained silent.²⁵⁰ When the Dutch delegation in 1990 asked the question whether corporal punishment in general fell under lawful sanctions, the Committee did not use this opportunity to address this delicate issue.²⁵¹ It was only during the consideration of the Namibian report in 1997 that the Committee for the first time in clear terms recommended the 'prompt abolition of corporal punishment insofar as it is legally possible under the Prisons Act of 1959 and the Criminal Procedure Act of 1977'.²⁵²

139 Most revealing and controversial was the fairly long and somewhat polemical debate on the question whether corporal punishment was covered by the lawful sanctions clause during the examination of the report of Saudi Arabia in 2002.²⁵³ In response to a respective Committee question, the representative of Saudi Arabia explained that corporal punishment was administered under full medical, judicial, and administrative supervision, full account being taken of the health status of the person concerned. The Quran set out specific sanctions such as amputation, flogging (whipping), and stoning for certain crimes. These sanctions emanated from God, were the law of the land and, therefore, permitted by the lawful sanctions clause in Article 1 CAT. In its Concluding Observations, the Committee expressed deep concern and recommended that the State party re-examine its imposition of corporal punishment (including in particular flogging and amputation of limbs), 'which are in breach of the Convention'.²⁵⁴ A similar recommendation was expressed more recently, when the Committee recommended Saudi Arabia to stop immediately the practices of flogging/lashing, amputation of limbs, and any other form of corporal punishment and prohibit their use by law, as they amount to torture and ill-treatment and constitute a violation of the Convention.²⁵⁵

140 When considering the report of Yemen in 2003, the Committee attempted to distinguish between Articles 1 and 16 in relation to corporal punishment.²⁵⁶ On the matter of flogging, the Committee had been apprised that the purpose of the punishment was not so much to inflict pain as to humiliate the victim. The Committee noted, that if the purpose was to inflict pain, the punishment would seem to violate Article 1, and if the object was simply to humiliate the victim, it appeared to constitute a violation of Article 16.

141 The Committee also expressed concern regarding certain provisions of the Criminal Code of Qatar allowing punishments such as flogging and stoning to be imposed as criminal sanctions by judicial and administrative authorities and, whilst not referring to a specific article, concluded that these practices constituted a breach of the obligations imposed by the Convention. It asked the State party to review the relevant legal provisions of the Criminal Code with a view to abolishing them immediately.²⁵⁷

The Committee also welcomed the enactment of legislation banning flogging as a disciplinary penalty for prisoners.²⁵⁸ In all of these cases the Committee has thus made it very clear that it understands that these punishments violate the Convention and cannot be subsumed under the lawful sanctions clause.

142 The United Arab Emirates, when accessing the Convention in 2012, also issued a ‘declaration’, confirming that ‘the lawful sanctions applicable under national law, or pain or suffering arising from or associated with or incidental to these lawful sanctions, do not fall under the concept of “torture” defined in article 1 of this Convention or under the concept of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment’.²⁵⁹ This ‘declaration’, which in fact is a reservation, was strongly objected by a number of European States, underlining that it is incompatible with the object and the purpose of the Convention.

143 Regarding the death penalty and methods of execution, with reference to Articles 1, 2, and 16, in 2006, the Committee expressed concern at substantiated information indicating that executions in the United States ‘can be accompanied by severe pain and suffering’²⁶⁰ and recommended that the State party carefully review its execution methods, in particular, in order to prevent severe pain and suffering.²⁶¹ One can conclude from this reference that the Committee understands that capital punishment might very well amount to torture. The Committee in the meantime also regularly recommends States parties to accede to the Second Optional Protocol to the ICCPR, aiming at the abolition of the death penalty.²⁶²

144 More recently, the Committee also expressed its concern that Hong Kong, China in its legislation still includes ‘lawful authority, justification or excuse’ of illicit conduct.²⁶³ The Committee not only reiterated that the prohibition of torture is absolute and non-derogable and that it does not permit any possible defence, but it also considered that the defence of ‘lawful authority, justification or excuse’ is broader in scope than the lawful sanction clause in Article 1. The Committee thus concludes that this regulation could lead to interpretations that are not in line with the Convention.

145 Regarding the Kazakh report, the Committee criticized that the definition in the Criminal Code excludes ‘physical and mental suffering caused as a result of “legitimate acts”’.²⁶⁴ It subsequently asked that the State party should ensure ‘that only pain or suffering arising from, inherent in or incidental to lawful sanctions are excluded from the definition, and should remove the reference to “legitimate acts” in that context’.²⁶⁵ It did not specify in any way about its understanding regarding the scope of the lawful sanctions clause.

146 It is difficult to find any meaningful scope of application for the lawful sanctions clause. One extreme interpretation is the one advocated by Saudi Arabia and other Islamic States maintaining that any sanction imposed in accordance with domestic law, including the most severe forms of corporal punishment and executions of capital punishment, was covered by the wording of the second sentence in Article 1(1).²⁶⁶ Such an interpretation is in clear contradiction with general international human rights (and humanitarian) law as expressed, for instance, in the case law of the Human Rights Committee in relation to Article 7 CCPR which considers any form of corporal punishment as a violation of international law.²⁶⁷ Such interpretation would suggest that the CAT, which was adopted in 1984 with the clear object and purpose of strengthening the already existing State obligations to prevent and punish torture,²⁶⁸ in fact had lowered this international standard. Accordingly, such an interpretation is clearly incompatible with the object and purpose of the Convention and can, therefore, not be upheld in light of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, which outline that States ‘may not invoke provisions of its internal law as justification for its failure to perform a treaty’.²⁶⁹ This provision by now forms part of customary international law.²⁷⁰ In addition, the savings clause in Article 1(2) prevents such an interpretation.²⁷¹

²⁶⁷ The HRC has already in its General Comment 7 of 27 July 1982, para 2, expressed the unanimous opinion that the prohibition of Art. 7 CCPR ‘must extend to corporal punishment, including excessive chastisement as an educational or disciplinary measure’. See CCPR, ‘General Comment No 7: Article 7. Prohibition of Torture or Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment’ (1982). Since the landmark decision of Osbourne v Jamaica, No 759/1997, UN Doc CCPR/C/68/D/759/1997, 13 April 2000, para 9.1, in which the Committee unanimously confirmed its ‘firm opinion’ that ‘corporal punishment constitutes cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment or punishment contrary to article 7 of the Covenant’, this interpretation has developed into constant jurisprudence. See eg Higginson v Jamaica, No 792/1998, UN Doc CCPR/C/74/D/792/1998, 28 March 2002; Sooklal v Trinidad and Tobago, No 928/2000, UN Doc CCPR/C/73/D/928/2000, 25 October 2001; Errol Pryce v Jamaica, No 793/1998, UN Doc CCPR/C/80/D/793/1998, 13 May 2004; and cf Manfred Nowak, UN Covenant on Civil and Political Rights: CCPR Commentary (2nd rev edn, NP Engel 2005) 167ff. The ECtHR had already held in 1978 that birching of a juvenile as a traditional punishment on the Isle of Man was no longer compatible with a modern understanding of human rights: see Tyrer v UK, ECtHR (n 163). In the context of colonialism, both the Trusteeship Council and the General Assembly of the United Nations had already in the late 1940s condemned corporal punishment in trust territories: see UNGA, Res 323(IV), 15 November 1949 and Rodley ‘The Treatment of Prisoners’ (n 98) 311ff. Similarly, the Geneva Conventions of 1949 and both Additional Protocols of 1977 clearly prohibit any form of corporal punishment, either as a penal or as a disciplinary sanction, in international and non-international armed conflicts: see Rodley ‘The Treatment of Prisoners’ (n 98) 316ff. Furthermore, r 31 of the UN Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners, which were adopted in 1955 by the First UN Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders, and unanimously endorsed by ECOSOC in 1957 and the General Assembly in 1971, clearly prohibit corporal punishment as a sanction for disciplinary offences in prison. Also see UNGA, ‘United Nations Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners’, as revised by Res 70/175 of 17 December 2015 (Mandela Rules). Finally, the UN Special Rapporteur on Torture (Nigel Rodley), in his 1997 report to the Human Rights Commission, in unambiguous terms, expressed the view that ‘corporal punishment is inconsistent with the prohibition of torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment’ enshrined, inter alia, in the Universal Declaration, CCPR, and CAT. In this context, he also clearly rejected the argument that corporal punishment might be justified by the lawful sanctions clause: see SRT (Rodley) E/CN.4/1997/7 (n 112) paras 4–11. When the Government of Saudi Arabia challenged the mandate of the Special Rapporteur to take up the issue of corporal punishment, the Commission responded by adopting Res 1997/38 which in para 9 ‘reminds Governments that corporal punishment can amount to cruel, inhuman or degrading punishment or even to torture’: see Rodley ‘The Treatment of Prisoners’ (n 98) 314. See also SRT (Nowak) ‘Report of the Special Rapporteur on torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment’ (2005) UN Doc A/60/316. 147 Another interpretation has been advocated by a number of predominantly Western Governments during the drafting process and by means of declarations of interpretation. According to this opinion, the word ‘lawful’ refers to both domestic and international law.²⁷² In other words, a Government may only invoke the lawful sanctions clause if a certain sanction is in conformity with its own domestic law and with international law. But what are the relevant standards of international law? One would first have to think of Article 16 CAT, Articles 7 and 10 CCPR, and the prohibition of all forms of torture, cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment as a rule of customary international law. Even when a State party to the CAT has not ratified the CCPR and does not accept the prohibition of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment as a rule of customary international law, it is still bound by the provision of Article 16 CAT which does not contain a lawful sanctions clause.²⁷³

148 Nigel Rodley in his function as UN Special Rapporteur on Torture in 1997 took the view that the lawful sanctions exclusion must necessarily refer to those sanctions that constitute practices widely accepted as legitimate by the international community, such as deprivation of liberty through imprisonment, which is common to almost all penal systems. Deprivation of liberty, however unpleasant, as long as it comports with basic internationally accepted standards, such as those set forth in the United Nations Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners, is no doubt a lawful sanction.²⁷⁴

149 Of course, imprisonment after conviction by a competent and independent court is a lawful sanction as it constitutes one of the explicit exceptions to the right to personal liberty.²⁷⁵ It is difficult to see how lawful imprisonment, which adheres to international standards and domestic law, can amount to torture as defined in Article 1 CAT, but there could be individual cases, where all elements of Article 1 are fulfilled, even though the application in such cases was not necessarily envisaged in the travaux préparatoires. The reason why Article 1 could apply in ‘normal’ prison settings, is that even a detention setting that adheres to international and domestic standards, can be a traumatic experience and inflict severe mental suffering for some individuals.²⁷⁶ Other elements of Article 1 would usually not be fulfilled in such cases: while there will often be the purpose to punish the individual, normally, there would not be an intent to inflict pain or suffering with such a prison sentence, especially in restorative justice systems. However, in retributive systems, there might be an intent to inflict suffering through a prison sentence and together with the purpose of punishment, this might lead to severe suffering being inflicted through one (or several) public official(s). Should indeed all domestic and international standards be fulfilled—and only then—the application of the lawful sanction clause might in fact be warranted, as otherwise a prison sentence as such might not

²⁷³ Such a provision has been discussed in the Working Group but was finally not adopted. See Burgers and Danelius (n 32) 74: ‘Nor was any conclusion reached on the suggestion to insert in article 16 a provision which would exclude suffering due to lawful sanctions from the scope of this article.’

²⁷⁴ SRT (Rodley) E/CN.4/1997/7 (n 112) para 8. This view is also taken by Yuval Ginbar, ‘Making Human Rights Sense of the Torture Definition’ in Başoğlu (n 120) 284ff.

be possible to be implemented. From the travaux préparatoires one may conclude that it was not envisaged to prevent prison sentences all together, although there is a clear international tendency to avoid them to the extent possible and have sentences as short as possible. Since in the majority of cases not all domestic and international standards will be fulfilled, one may conclude that practically there is only very rarely a scope of application for the lawful sanctions clause.

150 It has also been argued, correctly, that ‘where officials issue clear instructions aimed at creating poor and oppressive conditions of detention as a means of punishing individual prisoners, groups of prisoners, or all prisoners within a facility or a system, their actions may amount to torture and cannot be justified under the ‘lawful sanctions’ exception’.²⁷⁷ If there is no intent to create such conditions, there might nevertheless be a violation of Article 16 CAT.

151 Another scenario to be discussed could be solitary confinement: Sweden tried to justify solitary confinement as a temporary disciplinary measure by invoking the lawful sanctions clause. This interpretation indeed comes close to the original purpose of the lawful sanctions clause in the 1975 Declaration as it falls below the threshold of disciplinary measures prohibited by the Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners. If a prison ward places an inmate into solitary confinement in line with international and national standards and he or she does so with the purpose of establishing order or for the safety of the prisoner, then Article 1 does not apply. If the prison ward places the person there as a disciplinary sanction, ie for the purpose of punishment, but in line with the Mandela Rules, especially Rule 37(d), and other international and national standards, the individual is placed there nevertheless with the purpose of punishing him/her. If a prison ward has the intent to inflict suffering, then all elements of Article 1 are fulfilled. In fact, this might in principle be another scope of application for the lawful sanctions clause. However, as in the majority of cases not all national and international standards will be fulfilled, in practice only a very limited scope of application for the lawful sanctions clause can be envisaged.

152 Since individual intention and purpose are often not easy to prove, it has also been—rightly—argued that it might be easier and more effective in many cases to demonstrate that conditions of detention amount to other forms of ill-treatment and thus a violation of Article 16.²⁷⁸ It is clear that also other forms of ill-treatment are absolutely prohibited under international law—while such a finding might not oblige a State to prosecute the responsible actors, there will be a clear legal obligation to alleviate the situation of detention for the persons affected and make sure conditions are humane and in line with Article 16.

3.4 Savings Clause

153 Article 1(2) provides that the definition of torture is ‘without prejudice to any international instrument or national legislation which does or may contain provisions of wider application’. This is a typical savings clause as we find it in Article 5(2) CCPR, Article 53 ECHR, Article 29(b) ACHR, and other human rights treaties. It was introduced for the first time by Sweden in 1979 and can be found in a slightly amended version in Article 1(3) of the revised Swedish draft in 1979. Although some words have been changed during the discussions, this clause did not give rise to any substantial discussions during the drafting process.²⁷⁹

154 Whereas Article 5(2) CCPR refers to 'law, conventions, regulations or custom', Article 1(2) CAT only includes 'any international instrument or national legislation'. Customary international law, therefore, does not seem to be included in this savings clause. The reference to 'national legislation' means that any prohibition of torture in domestic law which goes beyond the definition of torture in Article 1(1) must be preferred to the CAT definition. This corresponds to the general rule that international human rights treaties only provide minimum standards, which may be exceeded by domestic law.

155 The term 'international instrument', as it is usually applied by the United Nations,²⁸⁰ contains both binding international treaties as well as non-binding declarations, principles and other 'soft law' documents. Relevant international instruments in the field of torture are, inter alia, the UDHR, the CCPR, the CRC, the 1975 UN Declaration on the Protection of All Persons from Being Subjected to Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, the UN Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners, as well as the Geneva Conventions and Additional Protocols. As far as treaties are concerned, the savings clause only applies to treaties which have been ratified by the respective State party. If a State party to CAT, for example, is also a party to the CCPR, then it is prevented by the savings clause in Article 1(2) CAT from invoking the lawful sanctions clause in Article 1(1) for the justification of corporal punishment because Article 7 CCPR, according to the case law of the Human Rights Committee, prohibits any form of corporal punishment.²⁸¹ But even if that State party has not ratified any other human rights treaty, the savings clause still prevents it from invoking the lawful sanctions clause as Rule 31 of the Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners clearly prohibits corporal punishment as a disciplinary sanction, and as the prohibition of inhuman and degrading punishment in Article 5 UDHR must today be interpreted as including every form of corporal punishment. The savings clause is, therefore, another argument to support the finding that the lawful sanctions clause in Article 1(1) needs to be interpreted in line with international standards and cannot be applied to justify corporal punishment.

156 In its Concluding Observations on the US report, the Committee refuted the argument of the United States that the Convention is not applicable in times and in the context of armed conflict on the basis of the argument that the 'law of armed conflict' is the exclusive lex specialis applicable, and that the Convention's application 'would result in an overlap of the different treaties which would undermine the objective of eradicating torture'. The Committee concluded that the United States should recognize and ensure that the Convention applies at all times, whether in peace, war, or armed conflict, in any territory under its jurisdiction and that the application of the Convention's provisions are without prejudice to the provisions of any other international instrument, pursuant to paragraph 2 of its Articles 1 and 16.²⁸²

1 The Convention does not contain any provision providing for a human right to personal integrity and dignity or not to be subjected to torture, cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, similar to Article 7 CCPR or respective provisions in regional human rights treaties. By making reference to Article 7 CCPR in the Preamble, the Convention rather presupposes the existence of this human right and, in ‘desiring to make more effective the struggle against torture' and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment, creates a number of specific additional State obligations aimed at preventing and punishing torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment. During the drafting process, the drafters decided to make a distinction between torture on the one hand, and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment on the other. Article 16 requires States parties to prevent cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment and refers to a number of specific obligations in other articles of the Convention which shall equally apply to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment. Article 2(1) constitutes the corresponding umbrella clause in respect of torture as defined in Article 1.

2 According to Article 2, States parties shall take effective legislative, administrative, judicial, and other measures to prevent torture in any territory under their jurisdiction, ie also on board ships and aircraft, in occupied, and other territories under their jurisdiction. In addition to the preventive obligations explicitly enlisted in the Convention, such as the prohibition of refoulement (Article 3), the obligations relating to the criminal prosecution of perpetrators of torture (Articles 4 to 9), the obligation to provide education and training to law enforcement and other personnel (Article 10), to systematically review interrogation methods and conditions of detention (Article 11), to investigate ex officio possible acts of torture (Article 12), and any torture allegations (Article 13), and the prohibition of invoking evidence extracted by torture in any proceedings (Article 15), the umbrella clause in Article 2(1) requires States parties also to take other effective measures aimed at preventing torture. Such measures relate primarily to guarantees in the context of the right to personal liberty and the right to a fair trial.

3 The comprehensive State obligations deriving from Article 2(1) are subject to international monitoring by the CAT Committee in all relevant procedures. In addition to the State reporting and inquiry procedure, individual applicants can also invoke violations of this provision in the individual complaints procedure under Article 22 CAT. If applicants claim that they have been subjected to torture in the past, the Committee concludes that the respective State party has failed to take effective measures to prevent torture and, therefore, finds a violation of Article 2(1) in conjunction with Article 1. If the treatment amounts to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment, the Committee finds a violation of Article 16. But the Committee can also find violations of Article 2(1) in conjunction with other State obligations, such as the obligation in Article 4 to punish perpetrators of torture with appropriate penalties.

4 Article 2(2) confirms that the prohibition of torture is one of the few absolute and non-derogable human rights. No State may invoke any exceptional circumstances, such as war or terrorism, as a justification of torture. This provision, therefore, provides a clear answer to all attempts aimed at undermining the absolute prohibition of torture for the sake of national security in combating global terrorism, such as the 'ticking bomb scenario' or special interrogation methods in the framework of counterterrorism strategies.

5 Finally, Article 2(3) prohibits in criminal proceedings against torturers any defence of obedience to superior orders by any civil or military authority. Domestic laws providing for such a defence therefore violate Article 2(3). But this provision does not exclude criminal courts from applying mitigating circumstances if a perpetrator of torture was forced by a superior order to apply torture.¹

1. Each State Party shall take effective legislative, administrative, judicial or other measures to prevent acts of torture in any territory under its jurisdiction.
2. No exceptional circumstances whatsoever, whether a state of war or a threat of war, internal political instability or any other public emergency, may be invoked as a justification of torture
3. An order from a superior officer or a public authority may not be invoked as a justification of torture [however, this may be considered a ground for mitigation of punishment, if justice so requires].

2.2 Analysis of Working Group Discussions

10 In written comments Austria suggested that Article 3 of the original Swedish draft be merged with Article 2(1)⁶ and later, during the 1979 Working Group discussions, it was agreed that the obligations of States in Articles 2(1) and 3 of the original Swedish draft could be consolidated.⁷ It was further agreed to delete Article 3 on the basis that its objective had been achieved by the revised Article 2(1) which generally corresponds to Article 4 of the 1975 Declaration.⁸ Regarding the precise duty of States parties to the Convention, it was pointed out by one delegate that while a State could undertake to adopt measures to prevent torture, it could not undertake to ensure that torture would never occur. Other delegates also questioned whether Article 2(1) was not too broad, or was juridically sound.⁹

11 There were differing views as to whether reference should be made to torture alone or also to other forms of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. During the 1979 Working Group several delegates suggested the deletion of references to other forms of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment because of the difficulty of defining the term.¹⁰ In written comments, the United States expressed the view that it considered it appropriate that Article 3 of the Swedish draft also address cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment since virtually identical obligations were already imposed under the CCPR and because 'the nature of the obligation was not likely to deter many States from ratifying the Convention'. The United States also sought to incorporate Article 7(2) of the Swedish draft as a second paragraph to this Article which requires that torture be punished by severe penalties.¹¹ At the same time, the United States took the opposite view regarding Article 2(2) of the Swedish draft, preferring to limit its scope to torture alone.

12 During the discussion in the 1979 Working Group there was a French proposal that the words 'within its jurisdiction' be replaced by 'any territory under its jurisdiction'.¹² It was stated that the phrase 'within its jurisdiction' might be interpreted too widely so as to cover citizens of one State who are resident within the territory of another

State. In support of a proposal to use the wording ‘any territory under its jurisdiction’, it was emphasized that such wording would cover torture inflicted aboard ships or aircraft registered in the State concerned as well as occupied territories.¹³ According to Burgers and Danelius ‘territory under its jurisdiction’ is intended to include not only the actual land and territory of the State and its territorial sea, but also ships flying its flag and aircraft registered in the State concerned as well as platforms and other installations on its continental shelf.¹⁴

13 In written comments the United States proposed a new article, very similar to Article 2(2) and (3) which would provide that there is no justification for any act of torture. However, they chose to limit the proposed article to torture as they argued that there was no precise definition of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. The United States argued that cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment was a relative term and that ‘international standards are more difficult to achieve and what might constitute cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment in times of peace might not rise to that level during emergency conditions’.¹⁵ The Holy See welcomed the provision rejecting any justification of torture on grounds of exceptional circumstances ‘in light of certain schools of thought which seek to give national security priority over the rights of the person’.¹⁶ It is interesting to note that the drafters of the 1975 Declaration were unable to reach consensus on the same issue. A proposal to delete the second sentence of Article 3 of the Declaration which referred to ‘exceptional circumstances which should not be invoked as a justification for torture’ was not taken up and the language remained in the final text.¹⁷ Regarding the term ‘internal political instability’, France felt that this term did not correspond to any clear legal concept and could be deleted.¹⁸ The Swiss delegation noted that Article 2(2) of the original Swedish draft and its analogous provision in Article VI of the IAPL draft were consistent with existing international law, which prohibits acts of torture and ill treatment at all times.¹⁹ At the same time they proposed a safeguard clause according to which the provision stating that ‘no exceptional circumstances could justify torture or other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment’ would be without prejudice to the provisions of the four Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 for the protection of victims of armed conflicts as well as the two Additional Protocols thereto of 10 June 1977.²⁰

14 It is clear that an order by a superior official of a State organ may be no justification for torture. The Nuremberg Principles had already established that respondeat superior was no justification for the perpetration of serious international crimes including torture.²¹

This was the first time that this principle of respondeat superior had been included in a human rights treaty and therefore also the first time that this principle was rejected as a justification for torture in a human rights treaty. During the drafting there was discussion as to the possibility of whether the order of a superior, although not being a justification, could still be an extenuating fact justifying a milder penalty in line with Article 8 of the Nuremberg Charter.²² In written comments the United States noted that although orders from a superior officer cannot justify torture, it is a factor that should be considered in mitigation of punishment and proposed the following new Article 4:

1. No exceptional circumstances whatsoever, whether a state or threat of war, internal political instability or any other public emergency may be invoked as a justification for torture.
2. An order from a superior officer or a public authority may not be invoked as a justification for torture.²³

15 During the 1979 Working Group discussions one (unidentified) delegate proposed the addition to paragraph 3 of a provision indicating that superior orders may be considered in mitigation of punishment if justice so requires. At the same time one (unidentified) delegate expressed his reservation about this paragraph. It was agreed to include the addition in brackets for consideration by the Commission on Human Rights.²⁴ Following discussion in the 1980 Working Group it was decided that the wording in square brackets should be deleted in Article 2(3).²⁵ There is nothing in the records that indicates what was actually said. Burgers and Danelius are also silent on this point. It is interesting to note that the ILC, in its formulation of the Nuremberg Principles, had deleted the sentence that dealt with the mitigation of punishment in Principle IV, regarding the reference to 'mitigation of punishment' as unnecessary.²⁶ Principle IV was adopted as '[t]he fact that a person acted pursuant to order of his Government or of a superior does not relieve him from responsibility under international law, provided a moral choice was in fact possible for him'.²⁷ In its report to the General Assembly the ILC explained that the question of leniency in punishment should be determined by a competent court during the sentencing process, stating that the text was based on the principle contained in Article 8 of the Charter of the Nuremberg Tribunal.

3. Issues of Interpretation

3.1 The Obligation to Take Effective Measures to Prevent Torture

3.1.1 Scope of Application

16 The Convention, strictly speaking, does not prohibit torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment. A provision stating that no one shall be subjected to torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment, as contained in Article 7 CCPR and similar provisions in regional human rights treaties, is missing in the CAT and had already been missing in the various proposals discussed during the drafting history.²⁸ It is likely that such an individual right was taken for granted by the drafters and needs to be assumed to be implicit in the Convention.²⁹ After all, in the Preamble the Convention explicitly refers to Article 7 CCPR and expresses the desire to make more effective the struggle against torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment throughout the world.

17 The formulation of Article 2 (1) must be interpreted as including the obligation of States parties to respect and protect the human right not to be subjected to torture. But the main emphasis of this formulation, as in Article 16, is put on the positive obligation of States parties to fulfil.³⁰ Article 2(1) CAT is drafted in similar words as Article 2(2) CCPR. The obligation to fulfil, derived from the latter provision, means to enact laws, to provide an effective remedy and procedural guarantees, to establish relevant legal institutions and other legislative, administrative, political, or judicial measures.³¹ Article 2(1) CAT puts the focus of the obligation to fulfil on effective measures to prevent acts of torture. This reflects the general object and purpose of the Convention, which is to strengthen the existing prohibition of torture by specific measures of criminal law aimed at deterring torture and other measures of a preventive nature.

18 The Committee has stipulated that the obligation to prevent torture and other ill-treatment under Articles 2 and 16 are 'indivisible, interdependent and interrelated'³² and that the obligation to prevent cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment in practice very much overlaps and is largely congruent with the obligation to prevent torture.³³ This is also reflected in the practice of the Committee, as it usually references Articles 2 and 16 together in its recommendations to States as part of the Concluding Observations.

19 The Committee has clarified in its General Comment on Article 2 that States parties are obliged to undertake 'effective measures to prevent public authorities and other persons acting in an official capacity from directly committing, instigating, inciting, encouraging, acquiescing in or otherwise participating or being complicit in acts of torture' as laid down in the Convention'.³⁴ The Committee has emphasized that States bear responsibility not only for the acts and omissions of their officials, but also for others, such as agents, private contractors, and others acting in official capacity or on behalf of the State, in conjunction with the State under its direction or control, or otherwise under colour of law.³⁵ States parties not fulfilling these obligations violate the Convention.

20 The question of whether the violation of the right not to be subjected to torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment is at the same time a violation of the CAT and whether a victim of an act of torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment can submit an individual complaint to the CAT Committee under Articles 2 or 16, respectively by now is clearly settled:³⁶ not only Pieter Kooijmans, the first UNSRT, answered this question in the affirmative by referring to the implicit obligation of States under Article 2(1),³⁷ but extensive case law of the Committee in which it has found a violation of Article 2(1) confirm this.

21 Generally, Article 2(1) is seen as an umbrella clause encompassing all the obligations to prevent torture as included but not limited to the in various provisions of the Convention, and Article 16 as constituting an obligation for States parties to prevent cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment. The typical obligations to prevent torture can be found in Articles 10 (education and training of law enforcement and other personnel), 11 (systematic review of interrogation methods), 12 (ex officio investigation of torture cases), 13 (investigation of allegations by torture victims), and 15 (non-admissibility of evidence extracted by torture in any proceedings). But also the prohibition of refoulement in Article 3 and the obligation of States to make torture a criminal offence with appropriate penalties in Article 4 and related provisions about universal and other forms of criminal jurisdiction in Articles 5 to 9 have a strong preventive character. Even Article 14, which provides for the right of torture victims to redress, can be interpreted as a measure with a deterrent effect aimed at preventing torture in the future.³⁸ If the individual torturers were held accountable to pay full compensation for all long-term rehabilitation costs of their torture victims, this would probably have a stronger deterrent effect than many criminal sanctions.³⁹

22 The understanding of Article 2 as an umbrella clause is partly, but not consistently reflected in the Committee's individual complaints procedure: when finding violations of other Articles of the Convention, the Committee in most cases (except with regard to Article 3) seems to find a violation of Article 2 (1).⁴⁰ At the same time, the Committee has found numerous violations of the Convention, especially with regard to Article 3, without finding a violation of Article 2(1).⁴¹ When consistently interpreting Article 2(1) as umbrella clause of the Convention, in principle, every time there is an act of torture, the Committee would actually also have to find a violation of Article 2(1).

23 Another question has been whether every single act of torture means that the State concerned has failed to take effective measures to prevent torture and, therefore, violated its respective obligation in Article 2(1). The practice of the Committee differs in this regard: In a case of torture it usually finds both, a violation of Article 1, as well as Article 2(1).⁴² However, it has also found violations of Article 2(1) read in conjunction with Article 1, but not of Article 1,⁴³ as well as a few cases where it found a violation of Article 1 and not of Article 2.⁴⁴ In Ali Ben Salem v Tunisia and Saadia Ali v Tunisia, where the Committee only found a violation of Article 1, but rejected finding a violation of Article 2, it did not dispute that a case of torture occurred but concluded—without any more detailed argumentation or analysis—that ‘the documents communicated to it furnish no proof that the State party has failed to discharge its obligations under these provisions of the Convention’.⁴⁵ This conclusion is insofar surprising, as that every single act of torture means that the State has failed to take effective measures to prevent torture and, therefore, violated its respective obligation in Article 2(1). As already concluded above,⁴⁶ it would be expected that in a case of torture, the Committee finds a violation of Article 2 (1) in conjunction with Article 1.⁴⁷

24 While Article 2(1) stipulates that each State party has to take effective measures to prevent torture, there is no explicit reference in Article 2(1) to the time frame to be applied in implementing these measures. The question therefore arises as to whether such measures can be implemented gradually through progressive implementation or whether States parties are required to meet their obligations immediately.⁴⁸ In general, the Committee has not accepted the principle of progressive implementation. It has rejected the argument that compliance with Article 2 was dependent on ‘... limited budgetary resources or limited professional awareness among staff’.⁴⁹ The Committee, however, has not always interpreted this provision as to require strict immediate implementation. In its concluding observations to Kazakhstan, it recommended that the State party proceed ‘promptly’ to amend its domestic penal law to include the crime of torture, consistent with the Convention, and to take ‘urgent and effective steps’ to ensure the investigation, prosecution, and punishment regarding torture allegations.⁵⁰ In contrast, in the case of Romania, the Committee stated that ‘the existing Government could not be seriously blamed, because it was quite clear that prison conditions could not be changed overnight and that considerable financial investment was needed. Nevertheless, the Romanian authorities should do everything they could to demonstrate their intention to improve the situation.⁵¹ The Committee therefore has allowed some degree of flexibility concerning the time frame of implementation. There may be circumstances in which a State is allowed, temporarily, some latitude in its compliance, while at the same time the State has an obligation to continually improve its national laws as well as the practical application of these laws in line with the Convention and the Committee's concluding observations and views adopted on individual communications.⁵² An act of torture, however, can never be justified. The Committee has made clear that 'torture should be prohibited whatever the stage of development of a country and whatever the nature of the offence being investigated'.⁵³

25 Boulesbaa rejects the idea of progressive implementation but at the same time asserts that the obligation of States to prevent torture is not absolute: 'The obligation is rather to take steps to achieve reasonable results in the prevention of torture'.⁵⁴ This contradiction is based on a simple misunderstanding of the obligations of States to respect and ensure human rights. Of course, the obligation of States to refrain from practicing torture (obligation to respect), which is also implicit in Article 2(1) as we have seen above, is absolute and, therefore, not subject to progressive implementation. Every individual case of torture, as defined in Article 1, constitutes a violation of this absolute and non-derogable right. But positive obligations of States, be they obligations of conduct or result, aimed at fulfilling a certain human right by means of legislative, administrative, judicial, political, and other measures are always relative and, therefore, subject to the principle of progressive implementation. Taking into account the indivisibility and interdependence of all human rights, this principle can no longer be applied exclusively to economic, social, and cultural rights, but must be applied to civil and political rights as well.⁵⁵ Just to give an example: if there exists a reasonable training programme on how to prevent torture for prison and police officials, States parties are still under an obligation under Article 10 CAT to improve this training programme further in accordance with 'good practices' by means of 'progressive implementation' and to report on these 'new measures taken' to the Committee in accordance with Article 19(1). But the total absence of any anti-torture training would clearly violate the State obligation under Article 10 as well as its general obligation to take effective administrative measures to prevent acts of torture under Article 2(1).

26 While the Committee has recognized that States parties may choose the measures through which they implement their obligations, it has equally emphasized that a States party must take measures that are effective and consistent with the object and purpose of the Convention.⁵⁶ In the reporting procedure, the Committee interprets this provision in the broadest sense and requests States parties to take a variety of measures aimed at preventing torture.

3.1.2 Legislative, Administrative, Judicial, or Other Measures

27 Article 2 stipulates that each State Party shall take 'effective legislative, administrative, judicial or other measures to prevent acts of torture'. The formulation that 'legislative, administrative, judicial or other measures' are to be taken to prevent torture means that there can be other measures than legislative, administrative, or judicial, as the word 'or' indicates.

28 Though the Committee has considered in a general sense which measures must be taken by States parties to prevent torture, it has equally emphasized that no exhaustive list exists and obligations to take preventive measures go beyond the items enumerated specifically in the Convention or in its interpretation.⁵⁷ Further, as methods of prevention are continuously evolving, the Committee has explained that Article 2 provides it with the authority to expand the scope of the measures required to prevent torture by building on other articles.⁵⁸ In its Concluding Observations the Committee has developed a wealth of measures to be comprised the formulation 'legislative, administrative, judicial or other measures', some of them with concrete reference to other articles of the Convention, some of them developed from the broad understanding of the formulation of Article 2 as an umbrella clause for State obligations to prevent torture.⁵⁹

3.1.2.1 Criminalization of Torture and Other Legislative Measures

29 The Committee has affirmed that taking effective measures against torture requires the States parties to ensure the implementation of Convention provisions by providing for the direct effect of these provisions. This may be by means of the transposition of the Convention provisions into national provisions or by recognizing the direct effect of the Convention provisions.⁶⁰ Recognizing the Convention text only is not sufficient, but rather it must be transposed into clear national provisions and instructions, also in order to allow the Convention to be directly invoked in Court.⁶¹ The Committee has expressed much approval for those States parties that have adopted a special law to implement Convention provisions directly.⁶²

30 In particular, States must criminalize torture under its criminal law, in accordance, at a minimum, with the elements of torture as defined in Articles 1 and 4 of the Convention.⁶³ The Committee has also on many other occasions affirmed the importance of other legislative measures, eg to adopt a definition for terrorist acts and ensure treatment in compliance with the Convention and to ensure that counterterrorism and national security legislation are in compliance with the Convention,⁶⁴ to prohibit corporal punishments⁶⁵ and criminal sanctions such as flogging and stoning by law,⁶⁶ and to prohibit hazing in the armed forces.⁶⁷

31 At the same time, legislative measures by themselves are not deemed sufficient. For example its Concluding Observations on Peru, the Committee expressed the opinion that the legislative and administrative measures adopted in order to comply with the Convention were not effective and therefore did not meet the requirement of Article 2(1).⁶⁸ This is also why the Committee usually recommends States parties to take a combination of measures, ie a mix of legislative, administrative, judicial, as well as practical implementation measures. One example in this regard is that in connection with implementation of the Convention and legislative measures to this end, States parties should at the same time make sure that public officials, judges, magistrates, prosecutors, and lawyers receive training so that they can apply the Convention and the jurisprudence of the Committee.⁶⁹

3.1.2.2 Detention and Interrogation Safeguards

32 The Committee has confirmed on many occasions that Article 2 requires the guarantee of a number of fundamental safeguards of suspected persons without which torture and other ill-treatment would be more likely to occur.⁷⁰ Also in the inquiry procedure, in finding that torture was systematically practiced in Lebanon, the Committee put particular emphasis on the lack of adequate legislation and implementation of fundamental legal safeguards.⁷¹ These rights include, inter alia, the right of prompt, unimpeded, confidential access to a lawyer, including during detention and if necessary to legal aid from the moment of the arrest and irrespective of the nature of the alleged crime.⁷² Furthermore, notification of relatives⁷³ and access to an independent medical assistance, without the presence of an officer, or at least out of hearing of authorities and free of charge should be ensured.⁷⁴

33 States parties shall make sure that all detainees are promptly brought before a judge from the moment of their actual deprivation of liberty and have the possibility to challenge the legality of their detention or treatment effectively and expeditiously, including when under administrative detention.⁷⁵ The Committee stipulated repeatedly that the maximum period of detention before a person is brought before a judge shall be forty-eight hours.⁷⁶ Thus, in the inquiry procedure under Article 20 of the Convention, the Committee unsurprisingly found in its report on Turkey, that detention for thirty days before involving a magistrate was too long.⁷⁷ In cases of a lacking supervision of detention by the competent judicial authorities or a competent oversight mechanism, the Committee has also found a violation of Article 2, paragraph 1, read in conjunction with article 1 of the Convention, due 'to an increased risk of being subjected to acts of torture and [the deprivation] of any possible remedy'.⁷⁸

34 The Committee confirmed on many occasions that these rights are to be afforded by law and in practice from the very outset of their deprivation of liberty and have to be the same for all detainees, including non-citizens, including in any form of administrative detention.⁷⁹ In case detention safeguards were not granted, also in case of administrative detention, the Committee has repeatedly found a violation of Article 2 in individual complaints proceedings.⁸⁰

35 According to the Committee, other essential safeguards are the verbal and written information relating to the detainee's rights in a language that they understand and generally to receive language assistance through translation and interpretation,⁸¹ the right to be informed of charges, and the right to remain silent.⁸²

36 Also, the maintaining of an official (electronic) register where all detainees are systematically registered from the moment of deprivation of liberty was recommended by the Committee,⁸³ with lawyers and relatives of those detained having access to these records.⁸⁴ Unrecorded places of detention are not permissible.

37 A worldwide study looking at the effectiveness of torture prevention measures equally concluded that procedural protections in the first moments of arrest have the greatest impact to prevent torture.⁸⁵

38 In Ramiro Ramírez Martínez et al v Mexico, the Committee has voiced its concern regarding preventive custody being implemented in military facilities, particularly its excessive duration and the lack of monitoring, as well as the number of complaints of torture by persons subjected to preventive custody, which lead to an environment that encouraged confessions obtained under torture and these being used as evidence.⁸⁶ The Committee has therefore found a violation of Article 2(1). As part of the State reporting procedure, the Committee has also recommended that States parties should reduce preventive detention to an absolute minimum and consider abolishing the practice for young offenders.⁸⁷

39 In the case of the State party's failure to introduce measures to prevent torture of prisoners by or with the acquiescence of authorities, as well as prisoner-on-prisoner violence and in the absence of an independent prison monitoring mechanisms, the Committee has equally found a violation of Articles 2 and 11 of the Convention in the individual complaints procedure.⁸⁸

3.1.2.3 Ensuring Independent Monitoring of Places of Detention

40 The Committee has stipulated that States parties should ensure that there are impartial mechanisms that visit and inspect places of deprivation of liberty.⁸⁹ With the entry into force of the OP in June 2006, States parties to the CAT are provided with an excellent opportunity to open up their prisons and detention centres to more transparency and independent monitoring by both the UN Subcommittee on Prevention and so-called National Preventive Mechanisms (NPMs). Preventive visits to places of detention have a double purpose. The very fact that national or international experts have the power to inspect every place of detention at any time without prior announcement has a strong deterrent effect by shedding light on closed institutions. At the same time, such visits create the opportunity for independent experts to examine, at first hand, the treatment of prisoners and detainees and the general conditions of detention. One may therefore conclude that the ratification of the OP by States parties to the CAT and the creation of independent national preventive mechanisms in line with OPCAT and the Paris Principles constitute important measures in the sense of Article 2(1) CAT.⁹⁰

41 Where NPMs have not yet been established, States parties should cooperate closely with NGOs and provide them free access to places of detention in order to guarantee independent monitoring.⁹¹ Unhindered and unaccompanied access to all places of deprivation of liberty shall be guaranteed⁹² and recommendations by monitoring mechanisms shall be taken into account and followed up with practical measures by the States parties in order to prevent torture and improve the situation in prisons.⁹³ The Committee has equally encouraged NPMs to avail themselves of the expertise of civil society organizations working in the same area.⁹⁴

3.1.2.4 Non-Refoulement and Asylum Procedure

42 Pursuant to the Committee, States parties' obligations under Article 2 encompass that they adopt all necessary measures to effectively implement its non-refoulement obligations under the Convention.⁹⁵ It shall, inter alia, be guaranteed that persons can submit applications for asylum, that all applications are thoroughly examined, and that persons have a genuine opportunity to effectively appeal any adverse decisions adopted, that appeals have suspensive effect, and ensured that 'all asylum seekers have access to independent, qualified and free-of-charge legal assistance during the entire asylum procedure'.⁹⁶

3.1.2.5 Investigations and Prosecution

43 The Committee has repeatedly emphasized that as part of its obligations under Article 2, States parties are to promptly, impartially and effectively investigate all alleged acts of torture and ill-treatment,⁹⁷ eg when traces of torture or ill-treatment are found during a medical examination,⁹⁸ in cases of deaths of persons in custody,⁹⁹ in case of excessive use of force by law enforcement agencies,¹⁰⁰ regarding non-field related deaths in the army,¹⁰¹ in case of summary executions and enforced disappearances,¹⁰² in cases of trafficking and sex tourism.¹⁰³ Those responsible shall be prosecuted and appropriately punished and victims or their families provided with redress.¹⁰⁴ In a number of individual complaints the Committee found a violation of Article 2, read in conjunction with Article 1, because no such investigations were undertaken by the State party or these investigations have been dragging for many years without any outcome.¹⁰⁵

3.1.2.6 Providing Redress

44 In the landmark decision Guridi v Spain the Committee confirmed the broad interpretation that even Article 14, which provides for the right of torture victims to redress, can be interpreted as a measure aimed at preventing torture in the future. The Committee found a violation of Article 2 of the Convention because members of the Civil Guard who were convicted for torture and were sentenced to more than four years of imprisonment and payment of compensation were later pardoned by the Government and the King of Spain.¹⁰⁶ The Committee also clarified that States need to exercise due diligence to intervene and stop, sanction, and provide remedies to victims of torture in order not to let non-State actors get away with impunity.¹⁰⁷

3.1.2.7 Independence of the Judiciary and Access to Justice

45 The Committee has called upon States to ensure the full independence and impartiality of the judiciary in accordance with relevant international standards, such as the Basic Principles on the Independence of the Judiciary, and make sure they can operate free from any interference from the executive.¹⁰⁸ This inter alia means that the selection, appointment, compensation, tenure, and dismissal need to comply with objective criteria such as qualification, integrity, ability, and efficiency.¹⁰⁹ Dismissal of judges has to be in line with the Basic Principles on the Independence of the Judiciary and the Bangalore Principles of Judicial Conduct.¹¹⁰ To this end, States parties should provide the judiciary with the necessary human, technical, and financial resources.¹¹¹ Also, rules of procedures of courts should be defined by the State party and an independent disciplinary body established.¹¹² Victims of torture and ill-treatment should have access to justice, with States parties having to ensure that the judiciary is capable of addressing impunity and providing redress in accordance with the Convention.¹¹³ States parties should ensure that security forces comply with court orders.¹¹⁴ The Committee also emphasized the importance of a gender sensitive judiciary, eg by recommending to Saudi Arabia the appointment of women judges.¹¹⁵

3.1.2.8 Combating Trafficking, Sexual, and Gender-based Violence, Including Domestic Violence and Violence against Children, Persons with Disabilities, and Other Groups in Situations of Vulnerability

46 The Committee, as well as the UNSRT, have stipulated that sexual violence can constitute a form of torture.¹¹⁶ According to the Committee, States parties should ‘redouble their efforts’ to prevent and combat violence against women, including femicide, gender-based murders, disappearances, rape and sexual harassment, violence against children, including corporal punishment, and violence against persons with disabilities.¹¹⁷ The UNSRT has emphasized that by not acting with due diligence to protect victims of domestic violence, trafficking, female genital mutilation, and similar practices, States may commit torture or ill-treatment by acquiescence.¹¹⁸

47 According to the Committee, States parties should adopt legislation that criminalizes all forms of violence against women and children, including domestic violence, marital rape, forced marriages, and sexual harassment.¹¹⁹ They should enact comprehensive anti-trafficking legislation, including a definition for trafficking, as well as labour legislation that legally protects migrant domestic workers and effectively implement this legislation.¹²⁰ Legislation has to be in conformity with international standards, including the CEDAW and the General Recommendation No 19 of 1994 on violence against women of the Committee on the CEDAW Committee.¹²¹

48 States parties should make sure that victims can lodge a complaint, that all complaints are registered, eg in a special record-keeping system,¹²² and that all allegations of trafficking, rape, domestic violence are appropriately investigated, while witnesses should be protected.¹²³ In its Concluding Observations the Committee recommended to ensure that rapists cannot avoid criminal responsibility by marrying their victims.¹²⁴ Generally the Committee ‘strongly discourages’ the settlement of sexual violence cases outside the formal justice system.¹²⁵

49 According to the Committee, research should be undertaken on the causes and extent of trafficking, violence, including sexual and domestic violence, as well as the impact of preventive measures, National Action Plans, and criminal justice responses in order to increase their efficiency.¹²⁶ States should make sure that law enforcement officials, lawyers, prosecutors, judges, social workers or migration officials or labour inspectors are familiar with legislation, are sensitized to all forms of violence against women, can detect domestic violence or trafficking victims, sexual violence, violence against children, and adequately respond.¹²⁷ Awareness raising shall also address the

50 Trafficking victims should have access to shelters and protection, including protecting orders; cultural and financial barriers to access these should be removed.¹²⁹ States parties should prevent the return of trafficked persons to their countries of origin if there are 'substantial grounds to believe that they would be in danger of exploitation and torture or ill-treatment'.¹³⁰ The Committee has underlined repeatedly that trafficking victims should not be penalized for acts committed as a result for being trafficked, be provided with immediate and genuine access to medical, social, and legal services, and receive rehabilitation, eg through programmes of assistance, recovery, and reintegration, in line with Article 14.¹³¹ The Committee also recommended States parties work with NGOs and establish systems and mechanisms of regional, international, and bilateral co-operation to prevent and punish trafficking and monitor their impact.¹³²

51 States parties should ensure that women, especially rape victims, have access to safe and legal abortions.¹³³ In the case of Peru, it was recommended that legislation should also allow distribution of oral emergency contraception for rape victims.¹³⁴ Women should have the possibility to seek emergency medical care in case of abortions without having to go through extraction of confessions for prosecution purposes and medical personnel being penalized when they exercise their professional duty, as denying medical care to these women might constitute cruel and inhuman treatment.¹³⁵ States parties should ensure that health professionals are informed about protocols on legal abortions as well as preserve confidentiality between doctors and patients in case of medical care in case of complications arising from an abortion.¹³⁶

3.1.2.9 Collection of Disaggregated Data

52 The Committee has underlined the importance of continuous evaluation and that States parties provide statistical data to enable it to adequately evaluate the Convention's implementation at the national level.¹³⁷ Data should be disaggregated by gender, age, geographical region, and type and location of place of deprivation of liberty. States parties should also provide data on preventive measures, disaggregated by relevant status,

3.2 Meaning of ‘any territory under its jurisdiction’

53 Article 4 of the 1975 Declaration and Article 3 of the Swedish draft referred to the obligation of a State to take measures to prevent torture and other forms of ill-treatment from being practised ‘within its jurisdiction’.¹³⁹ In 1979, France proposed to replace these words with ‘any territory under its jurisdiction’, because otherwise the obligation to prevent torture might even extend to a State’s own citizens resident in another country.¹⁴⁰ But it was stressed that ‘any territory under its jurisdiction’ would also cover torture inflicted aboard ships, aircrafts and in occupied territories.¹⁴¹

54 This formulation, therefore, seems to be fairly clear. States have an obligation to take measures to prevent torture in their own territory (land and sea), but also under any other territory under their jurisdiction, such as aboard ships flying their flag, aircraft registered in accordance with their laws, occupied territories, or other territories where civilian or military authorities of the State exercise jurisdiction, whether lawful or not.

55 The Committee has explained that it understands the concept of ‘any territory under its jurisdiction’ to be linked with the principle of non-derogability, and that it includes ‘any territory or facilities and must be applied to protect any person, citizen or non-citizen without discrimination subject to the jure or de facto control of a State party’.¹⁴² This does not only mean the State party’s sovereign territory but ‘all areas where the State partly exercises, directly or indirectly, in whole or in part, de jure or de facto effective control, in accordance with international law’.¹⁴³ According to the Committee, States have an obligation to take measures to prevent torture not only on board of ships or aircrafts under the flag of the State party, but also during military occupation or peace-keeping operations, in places such as embassies, military bases, detention facilities, or any other areas over which the State party exercises factual or effective control. This interpretation is applicable also to other CAT Articles as well as the OPCAT.

56 The Committee has confirmed this interpretation equally in the individual complaints procedure, as well in its Concluding Observations. In the case Fatou Sonko v Spain, where Spanish Civil Guard officers exercised control over persons on board of a vessel and the Committee therefore emphasized the State Party’s responsibility for the persons’ safety.¹⁴⁴ In its Concluding Observations to the UK’s report the Committee underlined its concern and called upon the UK to ‘publicly acknowledge that the Convention applies to all individuals who are subject to the State party’s jurisdiction or control, including to its armed forces, military advisers and other public servants deployed on operations abroad'.¹⁴⁵ Also the position previously taken by the US, that Article 2 was geographically limited to US territory in the strict sense,¹⁴⁶ excluding detainees at Guantánamo Bay from international scrutiny, was not only clearly rejected by the five independent experts of the UN Commission on Human Rights,¹⁴⁷ but also by the CAT Committee.¹⁴⁸ The US in the meantime has reviewed its position concerning extraterritorial application of the Convention and specifically acknowledged that it applies to Guantánamo Bay, as well as US registered ships and aircraft.¹⁴⁹

3.3 The Absolute Nature of the Prohibition of Torture

57 The prohibition of torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment is one of the few absolute human rights. Both torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment are prohibited, without any exception, in Article 7 CCPR and similar provisions in regional human rights treaties. This absolute prohibition is also regarded as customary international law and even ius cogens.¹⁵⁰ Furthermore, Article 4(2) CCPR provides that even in times of public emergency threatening the life of the nation, no derogation from the absolute prohibition of torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment may be made. Consequently, Article 3 of the 1975 Declaration and Article 2(2) of the original Swedish draft provided that no exceptional circumstances whatsoever may be invoked as a justification of torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment. In written comments, the delegation of the United States in 1979 proposed a new article providing that there is no justification for an act of torture. The United States argued, however, that cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment was a relative term and what might constitute cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment in times of peace 'might not rise to that level during emergency situations'.¹⁵¹ Although the Holy See had welcomed the broader text of the Swedish draft 'in light of certain schools of thought which seek to give national security priority over the rights of the person',¹⁵² the US position seemed to have been accepted by the drafters without much opposition. The revised Swedish draft on which the final text of Article 2(2) CAT is based no longer contained any reference to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment, which means that there is no explicit provision in the Convention that prohibits any derogation from the prohibition of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment. However, since the Preamble of the Convention clearly refers to the existing standards under the CCPR and the 1975 Declaration and affirms the desire of the drafters to make more effective (and not less effective) the struggle against torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment, one should not give too much weight to this retrogressive provision. The Committee has in the meantime also confirmed that the prohibition of cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment is non-derogable.¹⁵³ In addition, Article 16(2)

CAT contains an explicit savings clause in relation to other treaty provisions prohibiting cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment.¹⁵⁴

58 The prohibition of torture is both an absolute and a non-derogable right. Both concepts are sometimes confused. Not all absolute rights are at the same time non-derogable, and not all non-derogable rights are at the same time absolute. A human right is considered as absolute if, under normal circumstances, no limitations are permitted, ie the Government is not authorized by a specific limitation clause to balance the individual claim against certain State interests. A human right is considered non-derogable if States, under exceptional circumstances, are not permitted to derogate from their respective treaty obligations in relation to this right.

59 The absolute prohibition of torture, therefore, means that, under normal circumstances, torture must not be balanced against any other interest, including national security or the protection of human rights of others. All attempts to justify the practice of torture in the ‘war against global terrorism’ in order to extract information from a suspected terrorist for the purpose of, for example, saving the life of innocent civilians who are in danger of being subjected to an imminent terrorist attack (the so-called ‘ticking bomb’ scenario), clearly violate the absolute prohibition of torture as laid down in Article 2(2) CAT and Article 7 CCPR.¹⁵⁵ Accordingly, during the consideration of the US report in May 2006, the Committee urged the US Government to ensure that any interrogation rules, instructions, or methods ‘do not derogate from the principle of absolute prohibition of torture’.¹⁵⁶ Similarly, Israel has been repeatedly criticized for undermining the absolute prohibition of torture by having authorized ‘moderate physical pressure’ against suspected terrorists.¹⁵⁷

3.4 The Non-Derogable Nature of the Prohibition of Torture

60 Article 2(2) stipulates that torture can never be justified, even in the most exceptional circumstances.¹⁵⁸ It was primarily meant to stress the non-derogable nature of the prohibition of torture, ie the rule that even under exceptional circumstances, such as war, terrorism, or natural disasters, States parties are not permitted to derogate from their obligation to respect and ensure the absolute prohibition of torture. Apart from the successful attempt of the United States to delete cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment from this

¹⁵⁸ Of all the drafts, art 6 IAPL expressed this meaning in the strongest terms: ‘Torture can in no circumstances be justified or excused by a state or threat of war or armed conflict, a state of siege, emergency or other exceptional circumstances, or by any necessity or any urgency of obtaining information, or by any other reason.’

non-derogation clause, there was little discussion during the drafting of this provision. Although the French delegation wished to delete the reference to internal political instability because of its unclear meaning in international law,¹⁵⁹ this phrase remained in the final text. But the different examples are not exhaustive and only serve the purpose of illustrating what is meant by exceptional circumstances.¹⁶⁰

61 Although Article 2(2) does not use the term ‘derogation’, its purpose is clearly to prohibit any derogation which might justify torture. Article 2(2) follows in this respect the examples of regional human rights treaties, such as Article 15(1) ECHR (‘war or other public emergency threatening the life of the nation’) and Article 27 ACHR (‘war, public danger, or other emergency that threatens the independence or security of a State Party’), whereas Article 4(1) CCPR only speaks of a ‘public emergency which threatens the life of the nation’ without giving any examples. Since Article 2(2) CAT, in contrast to Article 4(1) CCPR, does not authorize but prohibit any derogation, the scope of application of the terms ‘exceptional circumstances’ or ‘any other public emergency’ is not relevant and, therefore, only of a declaratory nature.

62 The Committee has confirmed repeatedly that no exceptional circumstances whatsoever may be invoked by States parties to justify acts of torture, including political instability, terrorist acts, violent crime, or armed conflict.¹⁶¹ Referencing its statement made in relation to the September 11, 2001 attacks, the Committee also specified in its General Comment No. 2 that Article 2 obligations, as well as Articles 15 and 16 are provisions that ‘must be observed in all circumstances’.¹⁶² In this respect, the legal opinion of the Bush administration, as illustrated in the infamous ‘Bybee Memorandum’ of 1 August 2002, which implies that outside the territory of the United States acts of torture in the context of the ‘war on terror’ might be justified as an act of ‘self-defence’,¹⁶³ clearly contradicts the obligation of the United States under Article 2(2) CAT.

63 The Committee has repeatedly recommended to States parties to introduce in its legislation that no exceptional circumstances may be invoked as a justification for torture.¹⁶⁴ The Committee has also absolutely rejected ‘any efforts by States to justify torture and ill-treatment as a means to protect public safety or avert emergencies ...’ and ‘any religious or traditional justification that would violate this absolute prohibition’.¹⁶⁵ It has also emphasized that amnesties or all other obstacles to prompt and effective prosecution as well as punishment of perpetrators violate the principle of non-derogability.¹⁶⁶

64 In the inquiry procedure under Article 20 CAT, the Committee reminded the Government of Egypt of its obligations under Article 2(2) notwithstanding its legitimate efforts to combat terrorism. In this connection, the Government was urged to

3.5 Prohibition of Defence of Obedience to Superior Orders in Domestic Criminal Proceedings

65 While Article 2(2) is primarily directed at Governments not to derogate from their obligations to respect and to ensure the absolute prohibition of torture even in exceptional circumstances (no justification of torture by the Government, in particular the legislative and executive branch), Article 2(3) is primarily directed at criminal courts not to accept any defence by the accused based on a superior order (no justification of torture by the judicial branch in individual cases). This aspect was most clearly expressed in Article V of the IAPL draft: ‘The fact that a person was acting in obedience to superior orders shall not be a defence to a charge of torture’.¹⁶⁹ But the final text is based on the original Swedish draft which did not refer explicitly to criminal proceedings.

66 As with Article 2(2), a US proposal to delete the reference to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment from the Swedish draft during the negotiations of the Convention has been adopted, seemingly without much discussion.¹⁷⁰ The legal consequences of this deletion might be serious and at the same time confusing. States certainly can use the argumentum a contrario, ie that an order from a superior officer or a public authority may be invoked as a justification of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment. This would mean, to give a concrete example, that US military officers, by applying the infamous interrogation methods authorized by Defence Secretary Donald Rumsfeld for suspected terrorists detained at Guantánamo Bay, could invoke an order by a superior officer to apply these methods in a particular case only if such methods are legally qualified as cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment. If these methods are, however, considered as torture, the officer could not invoke the order and would have to be sentenced for having committed a crime. How should the military officer know whether the superior’s interrogation methods amount to torture or ‘only’ cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment if up to the present day there is an ongoing dispute as to how to qualify them?¹⁷¹ Since both torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment is absolutely prohibited under general international law, would such an interpretation not seriously undermine the absolute prohibition of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment? Although the obligation of States parties under Article 4 CAT to stop impunity only applies to torture and not to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment, this interpretation of Article 2(3) sends the dangerous message that even in countries which criminalize cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment, such treatment can be practised with impunity as long as it has been ordered by a superior. It, therefore, must be concluded that the deletion of the reference to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment in Article 2(3) seriously weakened the absolute prohibition of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment. But since it was deliberately deleted upon proposal of the United States, there seems to be no other meaningful interpretation in line with the clear wording of this provision, read in conjunction with Article 16 CAT. Whether this interpretation is in line with the object and purpose of the Convention is highly doubtful but not relevant for the interpretation in accordance with the respective rules of the VCLT.

67 The prohibition to invoke a superior order as a defence in criminal proceedings goes back to Article 8 of the Charter of the International Military Tribunal of Nuremberg.¹⁷² It was also adopted in Article 33 of the Rome Statute of the ICC, which provides that a superior order shall not relieve the defendant of criminal responsibility unless the person was under a legal obligation to obey orders of the Government or the superior in question; the person did not know that the order was unlawful; and the order was not manifestly unlawful.¹⁷³

68 According to Article 7(1)(f) of the ICC Statute, torture qualifies as a crime against humanity 'when committed as part of a widespread or systematic attack directed against any civilian population, with knowledge of the attack'. In such circumstances, an order to practise torture is by definition 'manifestly unlawful'. Consequently, such order cannot relieve the defendant of his or her criminal responsibility even if he or she was under a legal obligation to obey this order and did not know that the order was unlawful.

69 Article 2(3) CAT goes beyond Article 33 of the ICC Statute in so far as it applies also to individual cases of torture and does not provide for any exception. In other words, a legal obligation to obey orders and lack of knowledge that an order to practise torture is unlawful does not relieve the defendant of criminal responsibility. Article 2(3) simply states that no order from a superior whatsoever may be invoked as a justification of torture.

70 In its Concluding Observations, the Committee repeatedly stressed that Article 2(3) allows for no exception, that its provisions must be incorporated or transformed into domestic criminal law, that any domestic provision to the contrary must be abolished, and that the provision needs to be effectively implemented.¹⁷⁴ Subordinates are thus to be held accountable individually in case of acts of torture that were committed. The issue was discussed in 1989 in relation to the well-known individual cases of ORM, MM and MS v Argentina, in which relatives of Argentine citizens, who were allegedly tortured to death by Argentine military authorities during the 'dirty war' in 1976, claimed that the infamous 'Full Stop Law' [Ley de Punto Final] of December 1986 and 'Due Obedience Act' [Ley de Obediencia Debida] of June 1987 violated various provisions of the Convention.¹⁷⁵ The obligations of Argentina under Article 2(3) CAT were allegedly violated by the Due Obedience Act, which presumed, without admitting proof to the contrary, that those persons who held lower military ranks at the time the crimes were committed were acting under superior orders. Although the Committee had to declare these complaints inadmissible ratione temporis, it expressed, in a strongly worded obiter dictum, its concern that ‘it was the democratically elected post-military authority that enacted the Punto Final and the Due Obedience Act’. The Committee deemed this ‘to be incompatible with the spirit and purpose of the Convention’ and urged the Argentine Government not to leave the victims of torture and their dependents wholly without a remedy.¹⁷⁶ In 2004 the Committee welcomed with satisfaction the promulgation of an Act No. 25.779 in September 2003, declaring the ‘Due Obedience’ and ‘Clean Slate’ Acts absolutely null and void.¹⁷⁷

71 The Committee has also emphasized that States parties should establish a system to protect subordinates from reprisals, if they refuse to execute an order from a superior in violation of the Convention or cooperate in the investigation of torture or ill-treatment, including by superior officials.¹⁷⁸ At the same time, those who exercise superior authority—including public officials—are to be held fully accountable for torture or ill-treatment committed by subordinates if they knew or should have known about the conduct of their subordinates and failed ‘to take reasonable and necessary preventive measures’.¹⁷⁹ The Committee also emphasized that the responsibility of any superior officials, ‘whether for direct instigation or encouragement of torture or ill-treatment or for consent or acquiescence therein’,¹⁸⁰ has to be thoroughly, effectively, independently, and impartially investigated by prosecutorial and judicial authorities. Consequently, each State party should identify and report to the Committee any incidents of torture or ill-treatment and the measures taken to investigate, punish, and prevent future incidents, ‘with particular attention to the legal responsibility of the both the direct perpetrators and officials in the chain of command, whether by acts of instigation, consent or acquiescence’.¹⁸¹

3.6 Superior Orders as a Reason for Mitigating Circumstances

72 During the drafting of Article 2(3) there was a discussion as to the possibility of whether the order of a superior, although not being a justification, could still be an extenuating fact justifying a milder penalty in line with Article 8 of the Nuremberg Charter. In 1979, the Working Group agreed to add a provision to Article 2(3) to the effect that superior orders may be considered in mitigation of punishment if justice so requires.¹⁸² But two years later, this phrase was deleted again by the Working Group without any explanation to be found in the travaux préparatoires.¹⁸³ Was this phrase deleted because the Working Group found it unnecessary to state the obvious or must the deletion be interpreted as a sign that Article 2(3) CAT even prevents domestic criminal courts from taking superior orders into account as mitigating circumstances?

73 Boulesbaa refers in this context to the work of the ILC, which in its formulation of the Nuremberg Principles had taken the same approach as the Working Group.¹⁸⁴

The ILC felt that the reference to mitigation of punishment was unnecessary and, therefore, deleted it from the text. But it reported to the General Assembly that the question of leniency in punishment should be determined by a competent court during the sentencing process. Boulesbaa takes this parallel situation as a basis for concluding that the 'mitigation of punishment for carrying out superior orders is applicable to this Convention'.¹⁸⁵ Burgers and Danelius also state that mitigation of punishment 'cannot be excluded' but warn, however, that 'it would be contrary to the spirit of the Convention if the penalty was so lenient as not to take into account the very serious nature of the offence'.¹⁸⁶ Ingelse finds a lighter punishment 'reasonable considering the pressure to which a subordinate is subjected or his ignorance of the prohibition of respondeat superior'.¹⁸⁷ It is to be noted that this interpretation is also supported by the wording of Article 2(3), which speaks of a 'justification of torture'. While the acceptance of the defence of obedience to superior orders would provide a justification of torture by making it lawful, mitigating circumstances can only be applied at the stage of sentencing the defendant, ie after he or she has been found guilty of the crime of torture. In other words, mitigating circumstances do not justify torture and can, therefore, be applied if a perpetrator of torture convincingly argues that he or she was forced to apply torture practices and had no real moral choice.¹⁸⁸ On the other hand, Burgers and Danelius are certainly right that obedience to superior orders should not be used as an excuse and should never lead to lenient sentences.¹⁸⁹

Principle of Non-Refoulement

1. No State Party shall expel, return ('refouler') or extradite a person to another State where there are substantial grounds for believing that he would be in danger of being subjected to torture.
2. For the purpose of determining whether there are such grounds, the competent authorities shall take into account all relevant considerations including, where applicable, the existence in the State concerned of a consistent pattern of gross, flagrant or mass violations of human rights.

1 The prohibition of refoulement in Article 3 CAT codifies an important principle of general international law and a norm of customary international law. According to this principle a State violates the absolute prohibition of torture not only if its own authorities subject a person to torture, but also if its authorities send a person to another State where there are substantial grounds for believing that the person would be in danger of being subjected to torture. The Committee's task is to determine whether the expulsion, return, or extradition would violate the returning State party's obligation under Article 3¹—and not whether the applicant's rights under CAT have been violated by the receiving State. The CAT Committee has dedicated a General Comment to the principle of non-refoulement: General Comment No 4 (2017).²

2 The vast majority of individual complaints decided by the CAT Committee concerns Article 3.³ Until 31 March 2017, out of 318 Article 3-related complaints, 61 were admissibility decisions.⁴ Out of the 257 decisions on the merits, in 79 cases the Committee found a violation, in 178 cases a non-violation of Article 3.⁵ Most cases in which the Committee found a violation of Article 3 concerned applicants whose asylum applications were rejected and who were being or had been returned to the receiving State.⁶ This practice has led to criticism that the Committee acted as a kind of fourth instance in asylum proceedings, particularly in the Global North, rather than concentrating its efforts on denouncing torture in the States where it is perpetrated. The fact that countries of the Global North, such as Switzerland and Sweden, are those where the Committee has found the highest number of violations of Article 3⁷ can be explained by the high level of awareness of international complaints procedures among the legal profession, and the availability of legal aid, as well as by the fact that the optional individual complaints procedure under Article 22 has been less readily accepted by States with a record of systematic practice of torture. These cases also show that, in times of increasingly restrictive asylum and immigration laws in Europe and other States of the Global North, the authorities are put under a heavy political pressure which can lead to a substantial number of violations

¹ See eg Mutombo v Switzerland, No 13/1993, UN Doc CAT/C/12/D/13/1993, 27 April 1994; Khan v Canada, No 15/1994, UN Doc CAT/C/13/D/15/1994, 15 November 1994; Alan v Switzerland, No 21/1995, UN Doc CAT/C/16/D/21/1995, 8 May 1996; Aemei v Switzerland, No 34/1995, UN Doc CAT/C/18/D/34/1995, 9 May 1997.

² CAT, 'General Comment No 4 on the Implementation of Article 3 of the Convention in the context of article 22' (2018) UN Doc CAT/C/GC/4 replacing General Comment No 1 (1998) on the principle of non-refoulement.

⁶ Main receiving States in relation to violations of Article 3 are Iran, Turkey, and Democratic Republic of the Congo (former Zaire). See below Appendix A.7D, Figure 3.

⁷ See below Appendix A.7A, Table 1, Article 3 decisions broken down by State party (Host Country).

of the non-refoulement principle. Torture is one of the most serious human rights violations, and complicity or participation in torture, which includes sending a person to a country despite a risk of torture there, constitutes a severe violation of the Convention.

3 The principle of non-refoulement is absolute and affords protection to every person regardless of the threat he or she may pose to the national security of the sending country and regardless of whether he or she has committed serious crimes. No balancing of interests is permitted. In contrast to the Refugee Convention of 1951, Article 3 CAT guarantees an absolute right which is not subject to any exclusion or limitation clause. Thus persons who might, for instance, for national security reasons not be eligible for asylum are equally protected.

4 In contrast to the principle of non-refoulement as developed by the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) and the UN Human Rights Committee (HRC) on the basis of Article 3 ECHR and Article 7 CCPR, Article 3 CAT only applies to torture in the sense of Article 1 CAT, but, owing to the insistence of the US during the drafting, not to other forms of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment. However, other ill-treatment, not amounting to torture, is not irrelevant in the context of Article 3: the infliction of other ill-treatment is an indication of a torture risk⁸ and States parties should in their assessment of torture risk consider whether the risk of other ill-treatment 'could likely change so as to constitute torture'.⁹ Apart from that, the Committee has in its State reporting procedure urged States parties not to return persons to situations where they might run the risk of torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.¹⁰

5 States parties must not send persons to States where the risk of torture emanates from non-State actors who enjoy impunity either because the State fails to exert due diligence or because the State is not or only partially in control of its territory.

6 When methods of corporal punishment or the methods of implementing a death penalty as per national laws in the receiving State reach a threshold where they amount to torture, States parties are prohibited from returning persons to States where they might receive sentences imposing such treatment.

7 Although the text of Article 3 only speaks of expulsion, refoulement, and extradition, this provision covers all forms of obligatory departure of a human being (aliens as well as citizens) from one jurisdiction to another, including forms of ordinary or extraordinary 'rendition', as practised in the fight against global terrorism. Even the transfer of a suspected terrorist from the US detention centre of Abu Ghraib to another detention centre in Iraq under the jurisdiction of the Iraqi Government must be assessed in relation to the non-refoulement principle. Similarly, the Committee cautions against requesting and accepting diplomatic assurances from States with a known record of torture. Diplomatic assurances do not absolve a sending State party from its obligations under Article 3, and from carrying out the risk assessment mandated by the non-refoulement principle.

8 In order to guarantee the principle of non-refoulement, Article 3 also demands preventive measures, in particular legislative, administrative, and judicial measures against possible violations.¹¹ Such measures include inter alia procedural rights of the person concerned,¹² referral of the person alleging previous torture to an independent medical examination free of charge, in accordance with the Istanbul Protocol; or training of relevant personnel.¹³

9 Article 3(1) contains an explicit prohibition of refoulement. It demands ‘substantial grounds’ for believing that a torture risk for the person facing deportation exists. Article 3(2) stipulates that the ‘competent authorities’ of States parties must thereby take ‘all relevant considerations’ into account. In the following, this article analyses the following distinct elements:

1. Forms of prohibited conduct (‘expel, return (“refouler”) or extradite’) if substantial grounds exist that a torture risk exists upon return (see below, 3.2).
2. The meaning of ‘a person’ (see below, 3.3).
3. The meaning of ‘to another State’ (see below, 3.4).
4. The question of the particular treatment that the person would be subjected to in the case of expulsion, return or extradition to another State: Is the scope of Article 3 CAT limited to torture alone as defined in Article 1 CAT, or does the prohibition extend to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment in accordance with Article 16 CAT? How does the Committee deal with cases in which the applicant risks being subjected to torture which is defined as a ‘lawful sanction’ by the receiving State? What about a risk of torture posed by non-governmental actors in the receiving State? (see below, 3.5).
5. The question as to the probability of the torture risk: what is the time of the risk assessment? How does the Committee interpret the phrase ‘would be in danger of being subjected to torture’? What are the relevant factors for the risk assessment? What role does the human rights situation in the receiving State play? Are ‘internal flight alternatives’ or diplomatic assurances of relevance under Article 3? (see below, 3.6).
6. The standard of proof/evidence applied in assessing the risk of danger of torture: what is the standard of proof that can be reasonably applied? Who bears the burden of proof and when does the burden of proof shift? What is the procedure by domestic authorities and by the Committee? (see below, 3.7)

1) No State Party shall expel or extradite a person to another State where substantial evidence indicates that he may be in danger of being subjected to torture.

2) The evidence referred to in the preceding paragraph of this Article includes above all situations characterized by flagrant and massive violations of human rights brought about when apartheid, racial discrimination or genocide, the suppression of national liberation movements, aggression or the occupation of foreign territory are made State policy.

3) The provisions of this Article shall not be invoked as grounds for the refusing to institute proceedings against persons who have committed crimes against peace or mankind, or war crimes as defined in the relevant international instruments.

2.2 Analysis of Working Group Discussions

14 In written comments on Article 4 of the original Swedish draft, Austria suggested that a further Article be included which would oblige States parties to re-examine existing extradition treaties already in force to determine whether they were in conformity with the provisions of Article 4. Spain raised the question as to what should be done in the situation where an extradition treaty exists with a State which is 'suspected' of practising or tolerating torture and is not a party to the Convention, 'since it would necessarily prevent mandatory extradition under the extradition treaty'.

15 France suggested that the Article be reworded to read: 'No State may in any way expel, turn back or extradite a person to a State where there are serious grounds for believing that he may be in danger of being subjected to torture.'

16 Switzerland suggested that the provisions relating to extradition be subject to special requirements based on the motives for the practice of torture, as well as the circumstances in which acts of torture are carried out. The Swiss representative expressed the view that extradition would be ‘inconceivable unless the requested State believes that the person extradited will be given a proper trial by a court affording guarantees of fair judgement and that he will be detained in humane conditions’. The representative stated that, frequently, recourse to torture occurs in situations of domestic turmoil, in which the fate of individuals becomes very uncertain, particularly as a result of the suspension of constitutional rights and freedoms and that since the aim of a future Convention was not to create new categories of victims but to ensure the equitable punishment of the perpetrators of acts of torture, steps should be taken to prevent the alleged offenders from being subjected to the rigours of summary justice as a result of extradition.¹⁸

17 The UK suggested that the criteria for extradition should be more precise and therefore proposed the words ‘reasonable grounds to believe that he may be in danger of being’ should be replaced by ‘substantial grounds for believing that he would be ...’.¹⁹

18 The 1979 Working Group further discussed Article 4 of the original Swedish draft without reaching any conclusions. Subsequently, the Swedish delegate presented a revised draft²⁰ of the provision, which then became Article 3.²¹

19 This article gave rise to considerable discussion, much of which was a reiteration of the written comments submitted by States (above). The idea of having a provision prohibiting expulsion and extradition in certain circumstances received wide, although not general, support.²² Switzerland, considering that the aim of the Convention was not to create new categories of victims but to ensure the equitable punishment of the perpetrators of acts of torture, felt that steps should be taken to prevent the alleged offenders from being subjected to summary justice as a result of extradition and consequently favoured the retention of Article 3.²³ Regarding the question as to whether or not this provision would create problems in relation to already existing extradition treaties, Austria suggested the inclusion of another article stipulating that States parties should re-examine extradition treaties already in force to determine their conformity with this article. Spain considered problematic the specific case of existing extradition treaties with States suspected of practising torture but who were not States parties to the Convention, since the latter Convention would necessarily prevent mandatory extradition under such extradition treaties. The Working Group agreed that it would be preferable not to include an exception for such cases in the text of the article lest such a limitation be interpreted as encouraging extradition to countries where the person concerned would be subject to torture. It was therefore proposed that the following remark be included in the report of the Commission:

Some delegates indicated that their States might wish, at the time of signature or ratification of the Convention or accession thereto, to declare that they did not consider themselves bound by Article 3 of the Convention, in so far as that Article might not be compatible with obligations towards States not Party to the Convention under extradition treaties concluded before the date of the signature of the Convention.

20 In written comments based on the revised Swedish draft, while noting that the underlying objective of the Convention is to prevent torture, Italy pointed out that ‘some of the provisions of the [revised Swedish] draft could conflict with [States parties’] bilateral undertakings, [...] particularly with regard to extradition, expulsion, and return’ and that ‘[t]he Convention would [...] be applicable only between States parties and could not have a direct effect on agreements it made between those States and ‘third’ States which might conflict with it. In order to avoid the situation where a State party might find itself unable to observe the Convention without violating bilateral undertakings previously subscribed to, Italy proposed a new wording for Article 3 which, while providing for a number of specific undertakings by States acceding to the Convention, would make it possible to ensure the following:

- (a) that undertakings arising from this Convention should be considered to take precedence, between Member States, over those arising from existing agreements that conflict with it;
- (b) that States parties should not subscribe to new agreements conflicting with the Convention;
- (c) that States parties should proceed to modify any agreements to which they subscribed before the Convention on Torture, if implementation of those agreements could entail a violation of the principles embodied in the Convention.²⁴

21 The advisability of including the word return (‘refouler’) in the revised draft text gave rise to considerable discussion during the 1979 Working Group. Arguments in favour included the following: that there were strong humanitarian considerations for the inclusion of the word ‘return’ which broadened the protection of the persons concerned; and that the concept is also found in Article 33(1) of the 1951 Refugee Convention. Arguments against included the following: that the 1951 Convention covered a different subject area and besides was not broadly accepted; that the concept of ‘return’ might require a State to accept a mass influx of persons when it was not in a position to do so; and that disagreement over the concept of ‘return’ had led to failure in the drafting of the Convention on Territorial Asylum. It was therefore proposed that the term be deleted or that specific provisions be made in the Convention for States to attach a reservation to their acceptance of the Article.

22 A proposal by the UK to replace the phrase ‘reasonable grounds to believe’ that the person concerned might be in danger of being subjected to torture with ‘substantial grounds for believing that he would be’ in danger of being subjected to torture in order to make the criteria more precise was adopted in the revised Swedish draft. Other alternatives suggested were ‘substantial evidence indicating’ and ‘substantial indications’. The view was expressed that some of the formulations proposed, such as the word ‘grounds’, were too vague. The term ‘evidence’ was also criticized as possibly too technical and lending itself to different interpretations in the various legal systems. The view was expressed that such problems were difficult to avoid and that the effective application of the provision would, in any event, depend upon the good faith of those concerned. It was pointed out that as the purpose of the provision was to afford the greatest possible protection against torture, the evidentiary requirement should not be too rigorous and should be kept to a minimum. It was further said that the burden of proof should not fall solely upon the person concerned.

23 Certain minor amendments were also proposed. It was agreed that the words 'to a State' should be added after the word 'person' in the revised draft. These words were already present in the French and Russian translations of the draft. It was proposed that the word 'where' should be replaced by 'as long as' or 'when' so as to take into account a lapse of time which had removed the danger of the person concerned being subjected to torture. At the same time, it was felt that the word 'where' was adequate to cover such situations.

24 A fundamental change was proposed by the USSR in 1979.²⁵ Paragraph 2 sought to develop and illustrate the concept of 'substantial evidence' by citing certain types of situations which arose as a result of State policy and which, in the view of the Soviet delegation, were most conducive to torture practices. Although the lists were not identical, this list was based broadly on those mentioned in GA Resolution 32/130.²⁶ It was not possible to make an exhaustive list of relevant situations. The term 'colonialism' was not included because it was encompassed in the broader reference to the 'suppression of national liberation movements'.

25 Other delegates could not accept the Soviet proposal.²⁷ Concern was expressed that the listing of specific situations might be misinterpreted to imply that there were other situations where torture could be tolerated. It was also said that the main purpose of the Article was to ensure a separate evaluation of the case of each individual, and that it was thus not helpful to refer to general situations. According to the USSR proposal, the aim of Article 3(3) was to ensure that this provision could not be invoked as a pretext for refusing to institute proceedings against persons who have committed the crimes specified. The paragraph would secure punishment for such criminals, but did not oblige States to extradite them to countries where they could be in danger of being subjected to torture.

26 While one delegation proposed that Article 3 be deleted, most delegations were in favour of retaining a provision on this subject.²⁸ However, since no agreement could be reached on the wording of the Article, discussion was suspended to allow further consideration and consultation.²⁹

27 Discussions were resumed in the 1980 Working Group, still based on the revised Swedish draft. The USSR alternative text, which had been proposed in 1979, was reintroduced at the 1980 session. However, as the Soviet proposal caused problems of principle for a great many delegations, attempts were made to find a suitable compromise. In particular, the International Commission of Jurists made such an effort by proposing the following wording of Article 3(2):

For the purposes of determining whether there is such evidence all relevant considerations shall be taken into account, including, where applicable, the existence in the State concerned of a consistent pattern of gross violations of human rights, such as those resulting from a state policy of apartheid, racial discrimination or genocide, the suppression of national liberation movements or the occupation of foreign territory.³⁰

28 At this point, the Working Group turned back to Article 3(1). It was agreed that the words 'substantial grounds' in the revised Swedish draft should be rendered in French 'motifs sérieux de croire'. There was also debate over whether the word 'would' should replace 'may' which was considered too vague by several delegates. It would be translated 'estaría' in the Spanish version.

29 Article 3(1) was thus adopted by consensus as follows with an additional remark in square brackets:

No State Party shall expel, return ('refouler') or extradite a person to another State where there are substantial grounds for believing that he would be in danger of being subjected to torture. [Some delegates indicated that their States might wish, at the time of signature or ratification of the convention or accession thereto, to declare that they did not consider themselves bound by Article 3 of the Convention, in so far as that Article might not be compatible with obligations towards States not party to the Convention under extradition treaties concluded before the date of signature of the Convention.]

30 There was disagreement as to whether a second sentence should be added to that rule. Argentina stated that its adherence to the consensus on the first sentence was conditional upon the Working Group's agreement to an additional sentence. The proposal was to add a subparagraph to paragraph 1 of the Article in order to ensure that States under an obligation to grant extradition in virtue of a treaty could not free themselves unilaterally from that obligation and 'thus imperil the very institution of extradition'. The proposal was as follows:

If a State which otherwise would be obliged to extradite did not do so for the reasons mentioned, it shall take the necessary measures to bring the person, whose extradition it refuses to grant, to trial.³¹

31 This proposal created problems for many States that did not necessarily have criminal jurisdiction over the offences concerned. A person whose extradition to another country was refused because of a risk of torture could be suspected of having committed any kind of offence, and the offence would normally have been committed outside the territory of the requested State. In these circumstances, the requested State would often lack criminal jurisdiction, and many States would be unwilling to introduce criminal jurisdiction simply on the grounds that extradition had been refused. The proposal was supported by one delegate but other speakers stated that it would conflict with other national legislation and was liable to raise insoluble problems in some legal systems, including the absence of criminal jurisdiction, lack of evidence, and interference with prosecutorial discretion. The Argentinian proposal was considered to be based on a Latin American practice which was unknown in other parts of the world.³² Such a clause meant that the practice followed by the Latin American countries in extradition matters should not in any way be affected by the provisions of the present Convention.

32 Attempts were made to find a compromise at this point. One delegate proposed the following text:

³¹ HR(XXXVI)/WG.10/WP.8/Add.1.

³² Burgers and Danelius (n 21) 55.

A State Party which refuses extradition in the circumstances described in paragraph 1 shall, having regard to its national legislation, institute proceedings against the person whose extradition was refused.³³

Another representative suggested that the words 'having regard to its national legislation' be replaced by the words 'if its national legislation so permits'.

33 Sweden put forward the following revised proposal:

A State Party which refuses extradition in the circumstances described in paragraph 1 shall consider, on the basis of its national law, whether to institute criminal proceedings in that State against the person whose extradition was refused.³⁴

34 The International Commission of Jurists suggested the following wording:

If a State Party, which is under a treaty obligation to extradite a person to another State, refuses to do so in the circumstances described in paragraph 1, it shall, if its national legislation so permits, institute criminal proceedings against the person whose extradition it refuses.³⁵

35 No agreement on this matter was reached in the Working Group in 1980. Several representatives then requested that the expression in the International Commission of Jurists' proposal, 'if its national legislation so permits', should be placed in square brackets. Others requested that the proposal be withdrawn altogether. Similarly, there was no agreement on whether there should be a specific remark in the Commission's report to the effect that some States might wish to make reservations so as not to be obliged to refuse extradition to States not party to the Convention where such extradition was required under already existing treaties.³⁶

36 Discussions in the 1980 Working Group moved back to the Soviet proposal on paragraph 2 which gave a number of examples in which there would be a risk of torture. Opinions were divided. One representative suggested that paragraph 2 should end with the words 'human rights' or that the last three lines, which seemed likely to raise problems, be placed in square brackets. A number of speakers suggested the deletion of the entire paragraph or at least those three lines which, in their view, would inject unnecessary political overtones into the Convention and would in practice restrict the scope of Article 3. Other representatives, however, said that the deletion of the last few lines of paragraph 2 was unjustified. In their view paragraph 2 should not only be retained in its entirety, but the words 'colonialism' and 'neo-colonialism' as used in GA Resolutions 32/130 and 34/46, should be included therein.

37 Several delegations opposed any references to UN General Assembly resolutions in the text of the Convention on the ground that it is not good legal practice to incorporate a non-binding General Assembly resolution in an international convention that imposes binding legal obligations upon States. They stated also that no list of State policies could ever be exhaustive or agreed upon by the Working Group. The USA declared that such a list of State policies would have to include religious persecution, denial of free speech, suppression of political dissent, and the free flow of information, and armed intervention in the affairs of sovereign States.

38 No agreement could be reached on this matter and discussion was deferred for further consideration. The Working Group agreed to put the whole of paragraph 2 in square brackets and to insert therein the proposed terms 'colonialism' and 'neo-colonialism' as follows:

[For the purpose of determining whether there is such evidence all relevant considerations shall be taken into account, including, where applicable, the existence in the State concerned of a consistent pattern of gross violations of human rights, such as those resulting from a State policy of apartheid, racial discrimination or genocide, colonialism or neo-colonialism, the suppression of national liberation movements or the occupation of foreign territory.]³⁷

39 Article 3 as adopted by the Working Group in 1980 read as follows:³⁸

- 1) No State Party shall expel, return ('refouler') or extradite a person to another State where there are substantial grounds for believing that he would be in danger of being subjected to torture.

Remark: 'Some delegations indicated that their States might wish, at the time of signature or ratification of the Convention or accession thereto, to declare that they did not consider themselves bound by article 3 of the Convention, in so far as that article might not be compatible with obligations towards States not party to the Convention under extradition treaties concluded before the date of the signature of the Convention.'

- 2) [For the purpose of determining whether there is such evidence all relevant considerations shall be taken into account, including where applicable, the existence in the State concerned of a consistent pattern of gross violations of human rights, such as those resulting from a State policy of apartheid, racial discrimination or genocide, colonialism or neo-colonialism, the suppression of national liberation movements or the occupation of foreign territory.]

40 During the 1981 Working Group no agreement could be reached on maintaining, changing or deleting Article 3(2). Article 3(2), which was in square brackets, contained an illustrative list of consistent and gross violations of human rights.

41 Some delegations stressed the importance they attached to the retention of the illustrative list of consistent gross violations of human rights, proposing that the square brackets be deleted. Others considered that the list should either be deleted or amplified by a reference to other types of violations. Some members favoured the deletion of paragraph 2 in its entirety, finding it to be superfluous. One delegation said that the existence of most of the conditions in the list did not, either logically, legally, or otherwise, constitute grounds to believe that a person would be in danger of being subjected to torture.

42 The discussion was concerned in particular with the retention of the expressions 'colonialism' and 'neo-colonialism'. It was decided to delete the square brackets around these words, on the understanding that the paragraph as a whole remained between brackets.

43 Argentina maintained its earlier position by proposing a footnote reading:

The Working Group agreed that a State Party which refuses extradition in the circumstances described in paragraph 1 shall, if its national legislation so permits, institute criminal proceedings against the person whose extradition it refuses.

³⁷ Report of the Working Group of the Commission on Human Rights on a Draft Convention against Torture and other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (1980) UN Doc E/CN.4/1367.

³⁸ E/CN.4/1367 (n 37) Annex.

44 Several representatives raised the question of the legal effect of such a footnote in a document such as the Convention. It was suggested that it could more appropriately be included in the Working Group's report. In view of the difference of opinion, the author of the proposal requested that consideration of the matter be deferred to allow him to engage in consultations.

45 To bring the various language versions into line, the Group decided to replace the words 'preuves substantielles', in paragraph 1 of the French text, by the words 'motifs sérieux de croire', and the words 'de telles preuves', in paragraph 2, by 'de tels motifs'. In the English text of paragraph 2, the words 'there is such evidence' were replaced by the words 'there are such grounds' in order to bring the text into line with paragraph 1.

46 At the end of the 1981 Working Group deliberations the text of Article 3, as revised, read as follows:

Article 3

- 1) No State Party shall expel, return ('refouler') or extradite a person to another State where there are substantial grounds for believing that he would be in danger of being subjected to torture. Remark: Some delegations indicated that their States might wish, at the time of signature or ratification of the Convention or accession thereto, to declare that they did not consider themselves bound by article 3 of the Convention, in so far as that article might not be compatible with obligations towards States not party to the Convention under extradition treaties concluded before the date of the signature of the Convention.
- 2) [For the purpose of determining whether there are such grounds all relevant considerations shall be taken into account, including, where applicable, the existence in the State concerned of a consistent pattern of gross violations of human rights, such as those resulting from a State policy of apartheid, racial discrimination or genocide, colonialism or neo-colonialism, the suppression of national liberation movements or the occupation of foreign territory.]³⁹

47 Once again, no agreement could be reached in the 1982 Working Group. Regarding paragraph 2, some representatives felt that it was important to include in the Convention the proposed illustrative list of gross violations of human rights, which had several precedents in UN resolutions while others maintained that such a list was superfluous. It was again restated that some of the items on the list did not, whether legally or logically, constitute a basis for believing that an extradited person would be subjected to torture. One view was that, if the provisions were kept, references to other types of gross violations should be added. An alternative proposal was to keep the paragraph but to delete all words after 'gross violations of human rights'. The group decided provisionally to retain paragraph 2 between square brackets and to return to the question at a later stage.

48 During the 1983 session of the Working Group the observer for the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) made a statement in connection with the principle of non-refoulement. He pointed out that the application of this principle was not necessarily dependent on general characteristics of the situation in the State concerned but might also be required by considerations relating to the individual case. He felt that the present wording of the second paragraph did not emphasize sufficiently that the situation of the individual should be the ultimate determining factor. The Chairman-Rapporteur observed that the word 'including' in the proposed second paragraph made it clear that, apart from the possible existence of consistent patterns of gross violations of human rights, other relevant considerations should be taken into account.

49 Several delegations favoured the deletion of the second paragraph as being superfluous and/or lending itself to abusive interpretations. In this context, some delegates also referred to the remarks made by the observer for the UNHCR. Other delegates, however, considered it important to keep the proposed illustrative list of gross violations of human rights which had, in their view, well-established precedents in UN resolutions. Some delegations, who opposed the deletion of paragraph 2, stated that they would favour deletion of Article 3 in its entirety. Reference was made to the statements of certain delegations during earlier sessions of the Working Group, indicating that their States, at the time of signature or ratification of the Convention or accession thereto, might wish to declare that they did not consider themselves bound by Article 3 CAT.

50 Various proposals were made for amending the proposed paragraph 2, including the ending of the paragraph with the words 'taken into account', or the deletion of all the words after 'gross violations of human rights'. One delegate suggested retaining paragraph 2 up to and including the word 'apartheid', in view of the extreme gravity of this crime against humanity which was recognized as such by the United Nations. Some members considered that, if the provisions of paragraph 2 were retained, references to other types of gross violations should be added, such as all forms of religious intolerance, denial of freedom of expression, and denial of the right to form and join trade unions. Another proposal was the insertion, at an appropriate place, of the words 'of a systematic practice of arbitrary arrest or detention'. Since no consensus could be reached on any of the above proposals, the Working Group decided that paragraph 2 should provisionally be retained between square brackets and that the matter should be reconsidered at a later stage.⁴⁰

51 In the 1984 Working Group several delegations reiterated again the statement relating to Article 3(1) indicating that their States, at the time of signature or ratification of the Convention or accession thereto, might wish to declare that they did not consider themselves bound by Article 3 CAT. The delegation of Uruguay stated that it did not wish to oppose adoption of Article 3, but that it maintained its view that the inclusion of this article in the Convention was not advisable, since it might be misused by serious criminals to evade prosecution. The delegations of Canada and Spain expressed their disappointment with the fact that paragraph 1 of draft Article 3 referred only to torture and not to other acts of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.

52 The representative of Senegal, pointing out the possible connection between Articles 3 and 7, orally proposed the addition of a safeguard clause at the beginning of Article 3(1), which would read as follows:

Without prejudice to the obligations incumbent on a State under Article 7 of the Convention ...

53 Several speakers felt that such an addition was not necessary, because the obligations regarding extradition or prosecution under Article 7 would apply irrespective of any reference to that provision in Article 3. They also observed that Articles 3 and 7 aimed at different categories of persons (Article 3 at persons who might become victims of torture, Article 7 at persons who might have been involved themselves in the perpetration of torture.) In light of these comments the representative of Senegal did not insist on his proposal.

54 Regarding Article 3(2), various suggestions were made along similar lines to those made during previous discussions, such as deleting the paragraph entirely, retaining the paragraph but deleting the illustrative list, and maintaining the illustrative list but modifying its content. It was said that paragraph 2 might offer useful guidance to national courts which might otherwise give too narrow an interpretation of the first paragraph. The delegation of the Federal Republic of Germany, remarking that paragraph 2 seemed to concentrate on the situation in the State concerned rather than the specific risks of the persons involved, orally proposed adding the following sentence:

It shall be decisive, however, that there are in the individual case substantial grounds to believe that the person to be expelled, returned or extradited would be in danger of being subjected to torture.

55 Several delegations felt that such an addition was not necessary given that the draft paragraph already specified that 'all relevant considerations' should be taken into account. At a later stage the German delegation announced that it would not insist on its proposal.

56 In order to reach consensus, the representatives of India and Senegal proposed that only the first part of paragraph 2 be retained but that the illustrative list, which many Western delegates took exception to, beginning with the words 'such as', be omitted. This proposal was generally acceptable to the Working Group. The Soviet Union drew attention to a difference in the English and Russian versions of the text of Article 3(2). The Russian text spoke of 'persistent gross and mass violations of human rights' whereas the English text spoke of 'a consistent pattern of gross violations of human rights'. While accepting the Indian proposal in principle, the Soviet representative suggested that the English text be brought into line with the Russian text.

57 Several opinions were expressed concerning the meaning of those terms in the practice of the United Nations. After informal consultations the representative of India proposed, as a compromise, to replace the present formula in all languages with the following: 'a consistent pattern of gross, flagrant or mass violations of human rights'.

58 Another problematic area for several speakers was the 'passive formulation' of Article 3(2) which, in their view, did not make it sufficiently clear by whom the relevant considerations should be taken into account. In light of this discussion, and based on the compromise proposal of the Indian delegation, the representative of the UK proposed a formulation according to which 'the competent authorities' should take these considerations into account:

For the purpose of determining whether there are such grounds, the competent authorities shall take into account all relevant considerations including, where applicable, the existence in the State concerned of a consistent pattern of gross, flagrant or mass violations of human rights.⁴¹

59 At the ninth meeting of the Group, the delegation of the Federal Republic of Germany stated that, in order to assist the Working Group in reaching a consensus on ⁴¹ Suggestion with regard to paragraph 2, article 3 of the Draft Convention against Torture by the Delegation of the United Kingdom (1984) UN Doc E/CN.4/1984/WG.2/WP.4/Rev.1.

Article 3(2) it would not insist on its proposal for the addition of a new sentence at the end of that paragraph. The Working Group then adopted the text of the paragraph as contained in the proposal of the delegation of the UK. After the adoption of this paragraph the delegations of China, the German Democratic Republic, the Soviet Union, and the USA made explanatory statements for the record.⁴²

60 The representative of the German Democratic Republic stated that it considered the final text, and especially the phrase ‘consistent pattern of gross, flagrant or mass violations’, not fully satisfactory and that his delegation would have preferred the original version of the paragraph or a formulation based on GA Resolution 32/130 which had been adopted by a vast majority of States. He stated that his delegation’s final position on the subject would depend on the results of the debate on the remaining articles and he therefore reserved his right to revert to that question at a later stage.

61 The representative of the Soviet Union said that although he supported the compromise solution, he would have preferred the original version of the paragraph. He attributed great importance to the concept of ‘mass violations of human rights’. In his understanding, the concept of a consistent pattern of human rights violations already implied that such violations occurred on a massive scale. Therefore, the word ‘or’ in the text was not to be interpreted as indicating opposition between the concept of ‘gross’ and that of ‘mass’ violations of human rights. The two concepts were complementary and should be read together.

62 The representative of the USA said that the language in the paragraph under consideration had been taken from ECOSOC Resolution 1503 (XLVIII) as well as from GA Resolution 32/130. Therefore, according to his delegation’s interpretation, paragraph 2 included situations covered by ECOSOC Resolution 1503 (XLVIII).

63 The representative of China stated that although he had agreed to the final text in a spirit of compromise, he would have preferred the listing of examples in paragraph 2, such as a State policy of apartheid, racial discrimination, or genocide. The concept of ‘mass violations of human rights’ should in fact have been qualified by a mention of specific circumstances constituting such violations.⁴³

64 The Summary Record of the Thirty-second meeting of the Working Group⁴⁴ documents a statement made by the representative of the Federal Republic of Germany to the effect that Article 3 of the draft significantly supplemented the general ban on torture by requiring States parties not to hand over a person by force to any State where he or she would be exposed to the objectively verifiable danger of being subjected to torture. The representative further stated that the current wording was unequivocal and would thwart any attempt to misuse that provision for purposes unrelated to the Convention, such as an endeavour to obtain an unjustified right of residence.

65 In the Summary Record of the Thirty-second meeting, in reference to Article 3(2), the German Democratic Republic drew attention to the fact that they would have preferred the original wording of draft Article 3(2) with its ‘clear political references to apartheid, racial discrimination, genocide, colonialism, neo-colonialism, suppression of national liberation movements and occupation of foreign territory’.

66 During the Thirty-third meeting the USSR also expressed a preference for the wording of the original text of Article 3, arguing that a decision not to extradite a person to another State where there were substantial grounds for believing that he would be in danger of being subjected to torture ought to be taken on the basis of sufficiently precise criteria; similarly it would have preferred a somewhat more precise interpretation or definition of the expression 'a consistent pattern of violations of human rights' (apartheid, genocide, and so on).

67 Bulgaria reserved the right to express a final position with respect to Article 3, stating that it would have preferred the original version of Article 3(2) and adding that the phrase 'consistent pattern of gross, flagrant or mass violations of human rights' did not seem fully satisfactory. Uruguay expressed misgivings concerning Article 3. In the opinion of the delegation, the rules laid down in that draft article should be applicable to any offender, and not merely to torturers. However, in their view, the draft article gave the competent authorities discretionary powers of judgment, thus providing a loophole regardless of the type of crime. Several delegations had also referred to the possibility of making reservations concerning that draft article. The observer for Norway, while stating that his delegation fully supported the text as it stood, stated that he would have preferred that Article 3(1) refer not only to torture, but also to other forms of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.⁴⁵

68 During the consideration by the plenary Commission in 1984, the Soviet representative argued that the text could be improved in respect of Article 3.⁴⁶ On 26 March 1984 the UN Secretary-General forwarded the 1984 Working Group report and summary records to the Governments of all States inviting written comments concerning the draft Convention.

69 In written comments Burundi noted that Article 3(1) referred only to torture, and not to other forms of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. Cyprus also stated that while it was not desirable to make amendments at this late stage, certain articles of the Convention, including Article 3, could be improved so as to cover other acts of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. Yugoslavia stated that the manner in which Article 3(1) was formulated could lead to paralysis of the institute of extradition as an important form of international legal assistance in criminal matters, noting that existing practices of international extradition treaties formulate this in a different way by saying that extradition shall be refused 'on other substantial grounds', referring thus, first and foremost, to reasons of personal safety of persons whose extradition is being requested, and to torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment of such persons.⁴⁷ Yugoslavia also suggested that paragraph 2 should be reviewed since it only 'paraphrased the provisions of paragraph 1 and should therefore be deleted'.

70 In written comments Togo endorsed the view that it might wish to declare at the time of signature or ratification of the Convention or accession thereto that it does not consider itself bound by Article 3 in so far as that article might not be compatible with obligations towards States not parties to the Convention under extradition treaties concluded before the date of the signature of the Convention.⁴⁸ Thailand noted that the

3.1 The Absolute Nature of the Prohibition of Refoulement

72 Article 3 provides for an absolute protection against refoulement.⁴⁹ The prohibition of refoulement is a norm of customary international law⁵⁰ and according to some also a norm of jus cogens.⁵¹

73 Nobody can be excluded from this absolute protection against refoulement: persons who pose a threat to national security and/or have committed serious crimes and who might therefore not be eligible for asylum are equally protected.⁵² Article 3 'affords absolute protection against torture to anyone in the territory of a State party, regardless of the person's character or the danger the person may pose to society'.⁵³ The Committee also made it clear that 'no exceptional circumstances whatsoever may be invoked by a State Party to justify acts of torture'.⁵⁴ It explained that once a person 'alludes to a risk of torture ... the State party can no longer cite domestic concerns as grounds for failing in its obligation under the Convention to guarantee protection to anyone in its jurisdiction ...⁵⁵

74 The absolute nature of the non-refoulement principle rules out any balancing of interests between the individual right not to be subjected to torture when being forcibly returned and public concerns, such as national security concerns. This is of utmost importance in expulsions, extraditions, and renditions of terror suspects.⁵⁶ In Agiza v Sweden, concerning an Egyptian citizen found guilty by an Egyptian court of belonging to a terrorist group, Sweden rejected his asylum request on national security grounds which led to the deportation on the same day by a CIA rendition flight. The Committee reiterated 'that the Convention's protections are absolute, even in the context of national security concerns, and that such considerations emphasize the importance of appropriate review mechanisms'.⁵⁷

75 Criminal proceedings against or convictions of a person are not a valid reason to disregard the non-refoulement principle. In this context, the Committee criticized the exclusion of persons with a criminal record from moratoria on the removal of rejected asylum seekers.⁵⁸ Similarly, indictments and criminal proceedings involving persons accused of religious extremism and terrorist activities cannot be taken to prevail over the rights enshrined in Article 3 CAT, even if the State party invokes regional security.⁵⁹

76 In the same vein, diplomatic assurances cannot lift the obligation of States parties not to return persons to a country where they are at risk of torture.⁶⁰ The Committee stressed in its General Comment No 4 (2017) that diplomatic assurances 'should not be used as a loophole to undermine the principle of non-refoulement'⁶¹ and in its case law that they 'cannot be used as a justification for failing to apply the principle of non-refoulement'.⁶² In the State reporting procedure, the Committee requested States parties to '[r]efrain from the use of and reliance on diplomatic assurances, which should not be used to alter the absolute prohibition of non-refoulement'.⁶³

77 The absolute nature of the principle of non-refoulement should be enshrined and spelled out in national legislation. National legal frameworks must provide for a process of independent review of removal orders and must not include exceptions to the principle allowing, for instance, the expulsion of refugees on the basis of national security.⁶⁴ The Committee recommended in its State reporting procedure that 'expulsion and refoulement of individuals should be decided after careful assessment of the risk of being tortured in each case and should be subject to appeal with suspensive effect'.⁶⁵

The Committee also criticized States parties for introducing concepts such as ‘internal asylum’ and ‘safe countries of origin’ in national law, which do not guarantee absolute protection against refoulement.⁶⁶

78 In contrast to Article 3 CAT, the refoulement prohibition of the Refugee Convention in Article 33 (limited to refugees within the meaning of the Refugee Convention) is not absolute: The refoulement protection may ‘not ... be claimed by a refugee whom there are reasonable grounds for regarding as a danger to the security of the country in which he is, or who, having been convicted by a final judgement of a particularly serious crime, constitutes a danger to the community of that country’.⁶⁷ Apart from that, the Refugee Convention contains provisions which allow the exclusion from refugee status. Article 1(F) Refugee Convention excludes groups of persons which ‘are to be considered undeserving of international protection as refugees’ per se from its personal scope of application.⁶⁸ The Committee stressed in cases in which authorities had refused asylum applications by invoking the exclusion clause of Article 1(F) Refugee Convention that ‘the non-refoulement principle in article 3 of the Convention is absolute even if, after an evaluation under the 1951 Convention relating to the Status of Refugees, a refugee is excluded under article 1 F (c) of the latter Convention’.⁶⁹

3.2 Forms of Prohibited Conduct

79 Article 3(1) stipulates that ‘[n]o State Party shall expel, return (‘refouler’) or extradite a person to another State ...’ if a torture risk exists. This provision covers any form of obligatory departure to another State. It ‘is intended to cover all measures by which a person is physically transferred to another State’.⁷⁰ In General Comment No 4 (2017) the Committee deals with the question whether also measures not physically transferring but indirectly forcing a person to go to another State are covered by Article 3. It states that

States parties should not adopt dissuasive measures or policies ... which would compel persons in need of protection under Article 3 ... to return to their country of origin in spite of their personal risk of being subjected there to torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.⁷¹

80 Other international human rights treaties use similar terminology: Article 33(1) Refugee Convention uses the terms ‘expel or return (‘refouler’)’. Article 13 CCPR, which protects aliens against arbitrary expulsion, only refers to ‘expulsion’. The HRC interprets the latter provision as encompassing every form of ‘obligatory departure’ of aliens, including extradition, even though the drafters intended a more narrow scope of application excluding extradition.⁷²

81 In light of the travaux préparatoires and the practice of the Committee, it becomes apparent that Article 3 similarly protects any person against any form of ‘obligatory departure’ to another State. The original Swedish draft of Article 3, as well as the IAPL draft, spoke of ‘expulsion and extradition’. On the suggestion of France, however, the word ‘return’ (refouler) was added at an early stage of the drafting in the Working Group in order to broaden the protection of the persons concerned. This should ‘make the provision more complete and with article 33 of the Refugee Convention as an obvious source of inspiration’.⁷³

3.2.1 Meaning of ‘expel’ and ‘return’ (refouler)

82 The term ‘expulsion’ describes the obligatory departure of aliens from the territory of the returning State in its interest, that is for reasons of public order, national security, and so on. As far as this is still permitted under contemporary international law, the expulsion of nationals as a form of punishment is called ‘exile’.⁷⁴ Expulsion in the context of Article 33(1) Refugee Convention refers to ‘a State’s unilateral act of ordering a person to leave its territory and prohibiting his or her entry to the territory for the duration of this measures, and, if necessary, of forcefully removing him or her’.⁷⁵

83 The word ‘return’ also includes the practice of sending aliens back at the border before having entered the territory of the returning State. In the context of Article 33(1) Refugee Convention, however, the notion ‘return’ includes ‘any measure constituting safe expulsion, which forces a refugee who is already on the territory of the returning State to leave the territory’.⁷⁶ According to Kälin et al, the term ‘refouler’ ‘refers to a notion in French and Belgian administrative law which in turn refers to measures bringing a person back to the frontier of a neighbouring State, indicating that return has to be understood in a broad sense’.⁷⁷ It does not matter ‘[w]hether the return measure is provided for in national law or is merely a factual remove’.⁷⁸

84 In the context of Article 33(1) Refugee Convention, the term ‘deportation’ is sometimes used by domestic laws referring to the factual act of moving a person by force to another country, that is the implementation of a legal order to leave a country (expulsion order) if the person does not follow it voluntarily.⁷⁹

85 General Comment No 4 (2017) uses the notion ‘deportation’ for inter alia ‘expulsion, extradition, forcible return, forcible transfer, rendition, rejection at the frontier, pushback operations (including at sea) of a person or group of individuals from a State party to another State’.⁸⁰ From its jurisprudence it appears that the Committee uses the notions ‘deportation’,⁸¹ ‘return’,⁸² ‘expulsion’,⁸³ ‘removal’,⁸⁴ or ‘forced removal’⁸⁵ interchangeably.

3.2.2 Non-admission

86 The Committee has clarified that non-admission to a country may also engage the responsibility of the State party under Article 3 if it would force the person to a country where he or she faces a torture risk. If a person is under the actual control of a State—even if not within the State’s territory—for example in border situations, the State party must protect him or her from refoulement.⁸⁶ General Comment No 4 (2017) uses therefore the notion of ‘deportation’ also for ‘rejection at the frontier’ or ‘pushback operations (including at sea) of a person or group of individuals from a State party to another State’.⁸⁷ It also stipulates that a State party must apply the principle of non-refoulement not only ‘in any territory under its jurisdiction’ but also ‘any area under its control or authority’ or ‘on board a ship or aircraft registered in the State party . . .’.⁸⁸

87 Migration policies, in particular of countries of the Global North, increasingly aim at preventing persons from arriving at their borders by intercepting them on their route or even hindering them from leaving their country of origin.⁸⁹ Such measures often take place far away from a State’s legal borders but undermine the protection against refoulement.⁹⁰ The Committee has dealt with the applicability of the principle of non-refoulement in the context of *interception*⁹¹ in its admissibility decision JHA v Spain.

In this case, Spanish authorities had rescued more than 360 persons from Asia and Africa from a capsized cargo vessel in international waters. The Spanish and Mauritanian Governments allowed the passengers to disembark in Mauritania where they were detained until they decided to repatriate or apply for asylum. Spain had argued that the applicant lacked competence to represent the alleged victims since the incidents ‘occurred outside Spanish territory’. The Committee, however, referring to its General Comment No 2,⁹² stressed that a State party’s jurisdiction ‘must also include situations where a State party exercises, directly or indirectly, de facto or de jure control over persons in detention’ and that this interpretation of the concept of jurisdiction was applicable in respect of all provisions of the Convention, including Article 22 CAT. It reasoned that ‘the State party maintained control over the persons on board the Marine I from the time the vessel was rescued and throughout the identification and repatriation process’ that took place in Mauritania.⁹³ The Committee stressed that ‘the State party exercised, by virtue of a diplomatic agreement concluded with Mauritania, constant de facto control over the alleged victims during their detention’ in Mauritania.⁹⁴ However, it found the complaint to be inadmissible due to the lack of locus standi.⁹⁵

88 The Committee has criticized in its State reporting procedure the denial of entry at the border⁹⁶ and in particular policies of migration control such as interception measures⁹⁷ or offshore processing of asylum claims.⁹⁸ With regard to Australia, for instance, it criticized policies and practices . . . applied in relation to persons who, irregularly, attempt to arrive or arrive in the State party, in particular the policy of intercepting and turning back boats, without due consideration of the State party’s obligations under article 3 of the Convention.⁹⁹

The Committee recommended to adopt measures to ensure that the State party ‘effectively meets its non-refoulement obligations . . . in particular with regard to all asylum seekers and other persons in need of international protection who attempt to arrive or arrive in the State party, regardless of the mode and date of arrival’.¹⁰⁰ It also stressed that offshore processing as practiced by Australia¹⁰¹ ‘does not release a State party from obligations under CAT, including prompt, thorough and individual examination of the applicability of article 3 in each case and redress and rehabilitation when appropriate’.¹⁰² Persons would be also under the effective control of the State party (and consequently enjoy the same protection from torture and other forms of ill-treatment under CAT), when they are ‘transferred by the State party to centres run with its financial aid and with the involvement of private contractors of its choice’.¹⁰³

The Concluding Observations referred to mandatory detention, including for children, overcrowding, inadequate healthcare, and even allegations of sexual abuse and ill-treatment.

3.2.3 Meaning of 'extradite'

90 Extradition is a process by which one State hands over a person accused or convicted in the jurisdiction of another State to that State, usually at the request of the latter, for the purpose of criminal justice, that is for bringing him or her to trial or for serving a criminal sentence.¹⁰⁵ Thus while extraditions are in the interest of the requesting State, expulsions, returns or renditions are carried out in the interest of the expelling State for certain purposes (such as national security).

91 Extraditions are normally governed by bilateral or multilateral treaties, which may give rise to conflicting obligations regarding the non-refoulement provisions of the CAT. As Burger/Danelius argue, there is a potential conflict only if the extradition treaty was concluded before the State party ratified the CAT, whilst an extradition treaty concluded by a State already party to the CAT cannot be taken to involve obligations which contradict Convention obligations.¹⁰⁶ The rule of lex posterior derogate legi priori applies, however, only when both treaties include the same States parties, which again raises an issue if the receiving State in an extradition is not party to the CAT.

92 The prohibition of torture, however, must be regarded as a jus cogens norm which overrides other obligations of contracting parties. It can therefore be argued that the non-refoulement principle must prevail over any obligation of a State party to extradite a person to another State where he/she faces a risk of torture.¹⁰⁷

93 General Comment No 4 stipulates in this context that States parties to the CAT considering the conclusion of or adherence to an extradition treaty 'should ensure that there is no conflict' between such a treaty and the CAT and 'include in the notification of adherence to the extradition treaty the clause that, in case of conflict, the Convention will prevail'.¹⁰⁸ If the extradition treaty was concluded already before the ratification of the CAT (with a non-State party) the former 'should be applied in accordance with the principle of non-refoulement'.¹⁰⁹ In this case, States parties are also requested 'to inform the Committee about any possible conflict' between its obligations under CAT and under an extradition treaty from the beginning of the individual complaint procedure. The Committee will then 'try to give priority to the consideration of that communication before the time limit for the obligatory extradition is reached'.¹¹⁰

94 Whether the extradition leads to the extradited person being sentenced or not, is not relevant for the non-refoulement obligations of States parties. In Abichou v Germany, the applicant had already been extradited to the receiving State Tunisia, was acquitted in a trial there and released without being tortured or otherwise ill-treated. The Committee nevertheless found a violation of Article 3 as the risk was real at the time of extradition, and ordered the forum State to pay compensation to the applicant.¹¹¹

95 Extradition proceedings must satisfy minimum fair trial requirements. They do not exempt States parties from carrying out individualized risk assessments pursuant to Article 3 CAT in each specific case.¹¹²

96 The Committee has also pointed out in the State reporting procedure that extraditions to countries where a risk of torture exists is not permissible. It asked States parties to amend their legal framework in this regard and to provide information on the measures taken to ensure that such extraditions did not take place.¹¹³

3.2.4 Rendition

97 Article 3 also covers informal transfers such as renditions used in the context of the so-called War on Terror since 9/11.¹¹⁴ The USA, in the ‘war against terror’, has introduced a new category of ‘obligatory departure’, known as ordinary or extraordinary ‘rendition’ of suspected terrorists. The notion ‘ordinary rendition’ is usually used for the forcible abduction and removal of a suspect, by military or intelligence agents, from the territory of another State for the purpose of bringing him or her to justice.¹¹⁵ ‘Extraordinary rendition’ is described to ‘usually involve ... a person who is not formally charged with any crime by the country conducting the abduction. Instead, the person is seized abroad and transported to a third country.’¹¹⁶ It is a hybrid human rights violation, combining elements of arbitrary arrest, enforced disappearance, forcible transfer, torture, denial of access to consular officials, and denial of impartial tribunals. It involves the State-sponsored abduction of a person in one country, with or without the cooperation of the Government of that country, and the subsequent transfer of that person to another country for detention and interrogation¹¹⁷ and ‘appears to be a practice in which perpetrators attempt to avoid legal and moral constraints by denying their involvement in the abuses’.¹¹⁸ ‘Extraordinary renditions’, as practised by the US after 11 September 2001 for the purpose of moving suspected terrorists to other countries in order to subject them to harsher interrogation methods away from external scrutiny,¹¹⁹ clearly violate the non-refoulement principle in Article 3.¹²⁰

The contribution of European countries by for instance ‘turning a blind eye’ to extraordinary renditions across their territory and airspace or secret detention sites on their territory was found by the ECHR to violate Article 3 in numerous cases¹²¹ and has been criticized not only by the European Parliament¹²² and the Council of Europe Parliamentary Assembly,¹²³ but also by the CAT Committee (see below §§ 98–99).

98 The Committee has dealt with an extraordinary rendition in its individual complaints case Agiza v Sweden. It held that a State party violates Article 3 CAT if it cooperates in extraordinary rendition by arresting a person and extrajudicially handing him or her over to agents of a foreign State. Mr. Agiza, an Egyptian national, had applied for asylum in Sweden after having been sentenced in Egypt in absentia for terrorism charges linked to Islamic fundamentalism. On return he would have been executed. In 2001, after his asylum application had been rejected on security grounds, he was transferred to the airport, handed over to special agents (hooded, strip-searched, hands and feet bound), brought to Egypt on a private airplane owned by a US company and frequently used by the US Government, and allegedly severely tortured in Egypt. The Committee stressed that the Swedish authorities knew or should have known that at the time of removal there

¹²¹ In its judgment El-Masri (2012) a German national of Lebanese origin claimed that he had been a victim of a secret ‘rendition’ operation bringing him from Macedonia to Afghanistan. He put forward that he was arrested, held in isolation, questioned and ill-treated in a Skopje hotel for twenty-three days, then transferred to CIA agents who brought him to a secret detention facility in Afghanistan, where he was further ill-treated for more than four months. The Court found a violation of Art 3 ECHR on account of the inhuman and degrading treatment subjected in the Skopje hotel, his treatment at Skopje Airport, which amounted to torture, and on account of his transfer into the custody of the US authorities, thus exposing him to the risk of further treatment contrary to Art 3 ECHR. The Court also found a violation of Art 3 ECHR on account of the failure of FYROM to carry out an effective investigation into the applicant’s allegations of ill-treatment: El-Masri v the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia [GC] App no 39630/09 (ECtHR, 13 December 2012). was consistent and widespread use of torture by Egyptian authorities against detainees, in particular if held for political and security reasons; that its own security intelligence service thought that the applicant was involved in terrorist activities, was a threat to its national security, and of interest to intelligence services of the US and Egypt. The Committee concluded that the expulsion violated Article 3.¹²⁴

99 In several Concluding Observations, the Committee criticized alleged cooperation of States parties in extraordinary rendition programmes, such as serving as departure or destination points, allowing rendition flights to use airports and airspace, but also the inadequate response with regard to the investigation of such allegations.¹²⁵ In this context, the Committee made clear that a State party ‘should ensure that no one who is at any time under its control becomes the object of an “extraordinary rendition”’ and that ‘the transfer, refoulement, detention or interrogation of persons under such circumstances is in itself a violation of the Convention’.¹²⁶ It further recommended States parties to conduct effective, impartial, and transparent investigations on alleged involvement in rendition programmes by an independent body,¹²⁷ to prosecute and punish responsible officials and to make the outcome public,¹²⁸ to inform the public,¹²⁹ to take all necessary measures to prevent the future incidents of such situations,¹³⁰ or to ensure compensation for victims.¹³¹ In the context of cases of the ECtHR on the CIA rendition and secret detention against Poland, the Committee also recommended to cooperate with the Court.¹³²

3.3 Meaning of ‘a Person’

100 The protection of Article 3 applies to any person, that is every human being,¹³³ regardless of any status, such as nationality, citizenship, or residence status. There is no limitation on the personal scope of Article 3. General Comment No 4 (2017) stipulates in this context that a State party must apply the principle of non-refoulement

[...] to any person, including persons requesting or in need of international protection, without any form of discrimination and regardless of the nationality or statelessness or the legal, administrative or judicial status of the person concerned under ordinary or emergency law.¹³⁴

3.4 Meaning of ‘to Another State’

102 While earlier drafts did not contain any reference to the destination of the expulsion, extradition, or return, or used the term ‘a State’, the expression ‘another State’ was first introduced in March 1979 by the proposal of the USSR, which is also the basis for the additional requirement of an existence of a consistent pattern of gross, flagrant, or mass violations of human rights in that State according to Article 3(2). At that time, certain delegations, including Austria and Italy, still maintained the position that the prohibition of refoulement should only apply among States parties as it could create problems in relation to already existing extradition treaties with States not parties to the CAT.

103 It follows from the travaux préparatoires and the practice of the Committee that the term ‘another State’ goes beyond States parties to the Convention and applies to all States in the world where the person concerned faces a real risk of torture. The obligation of Article 3 is indeed seen to be ‘especially important as to the transfer of a person to a State which is not a Party to the Convention, since such a State ... may not have made any internationally binding undertaking to suppress torture in its territory’.¹³⁷

104 The Committee has specified in its General Comment No 4 (2017) that the phrase ‘another State’ refers to the State to which the individual is being expelled, returned, or extradited as well as to a State ‘where he/she may subsequently face deportation to a third State in which there are substantial grounds for believing that he/she would be in danger of being subjected to torture’.¹³⁸

105 The use of the notion ‘State’ (instead of, eg, ‘territory’) suggests that only territories under the sovereign control of a State come within the scope of Article 3 CAT. However, according to Wouters ‘removing a person to a territory which is not governed by a sovereign State’ would also fall within the scope of Article 3 since this would be ‘in accordance with the object and purpose of Article 3 and would be in line with the idea that even in the absence of a State authority torture can exist’.¹³⁹

106 In the context of the global fight against terrorism, the Committee stressed in its State reporting procedure that the Convention protection extends to all territories under the jurisdiction of a State party including all areas under the de facto effective control of the State party’s authorities¹⁴⁰ such as the US detention facility Guantánamo Bay on Cuba. This is also reflected in General Comment No 4 (2017) which states that a State party must apply the principle of non-refoulement not only ‘in any territory under its jurisdiction’ but also ‘any area under its control or authority’ or ‘on board a ship or aircraft registered in the State party ...’.¹⁴¹ Furthermore, the General Comment also expressly refers to 'rendition' or 'forcible transfer ... of a person or group of individuals from a State party to another State'.¹⁴²

107 The Committee has confirmed that the principle of non-refoulement also applies to transfers of suspected terrorist by States parties from its detention facilities abroad to any other State, even if the transfers take place within the same third State, for example the transfer by the UK from a UK detention facility in Afghanistan or Iraq to another detention facility in the same country, which is under the control of local authorities.¹⁴³ In this case Iraq or Afghanistan would be 'another State' in relation to a UK detention facility in Iraq or Afghanistan. The Committee has stressed several times that it is its 'constant view' that Article 3 CAT and the non-refoulement obligation 'apply to a State party's military forces, wherever situated, where they exercise effective control, de jure or de facto, over an individual' and that '[w]ith regard to the possible transfer of detainees within a State party's effective custody to the custody of any other State, the State party should ensure that it complies fully with article 3 ... in all circumstances'.¹⁴⁴ Interpreting the term 'another State' as referring to any transfer of a person from one State jurisdiction to another can be seen also to be in line with the purpose of the absolute prohibition of refoulement.

108 The Committee has dealt in its State reporting procedure also with the applicability of the principle of non-refoulement to transfers of persons between different contingents of multinational forces such as the transfer of prisoners from the Danish contingent of the International Security Assistance Force (ISAF) in Afghanistan to allied forces during a joint military operation in 2002, 'in circumstances where allegations later emerged of ill-treatment while the men were in allied forces' custody'.¹⁴⁵ The Committee noted that its 'constant view', according to which Article 3 CAT applies extraterritorially where States' military forces exercise effective control over individuals, would 'remain[.] so even if the State party's forces are subject to operational command of another State' so that 'the transfer of a detainee from its custody to the authority of another State is impermissible when the transferring State was or should have been aware of a real risk of torture'.¹⁴⁶ This means that a State party which participates in multinational forces has to assess whether the transfer of a person to the forces of the USA would expose the person to a risk of torture and 'consider that the US refuses extraterritorial application of the CAT' so that 'the CAT does not protect persons transferred to the US forces'. Thus, given that Article 3 CAT prohibits indirect refoulement, a State that participates in multinational forces must not transfer detainees from its contingent's effective control to that of another State's contingent where the detainee faces a risk of second transfer to a third State.¹⁴⁷ The Committee's criticism and recommendations also related to the investigation of circumstances of the transfer of prisoners by States parties to the custody of other States' forces in military operations abroad, for example in the context of the Danish participation in the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.¹⁴⁸

3.4.1 Indirect Refoulement

109 In General Comment No 4 (2017), the Committee defines ‘another State’ also as a State ‘where he/she may subsequently face deportation to a third State in which there are substantial grounds for believing that he/she would be in danger of being subjected to torture’¹⁴⁹ (see above, § 104). The latter aspect is sometimes referred to as ‘indirect refoulement’¹⁵⁰ or ‘chain refoulement’.

110 In its case law, the Committee stated that the State party should refrain also from expelling the applicant ‘to any other country where he runs a real risk of being expelled or returned’ to his or her country of origin.¹⁵¹ It also stressed that ‘a foreseeable, real and personal risk must exist of being tortured in the country to which a person is returned or ... a third country where it is foreseeable that he subsequently may be expelled’.¹⁵² The Committee usually first conducts a full test regarding the existence of a real risk in the country of origin and only if substantial grounds for believing that a torture risk exists, it makes a full assessment of the risk of subsequent removal by a third State, that is whether indirect refoulement would violate Article 3.¹⁵³ Wouters argues that ‘[w]hat remains unclear is the level of risk involved in this assessment of the subsequent removal by the third country to the country of origin’.¹⁵⁴

3.4.2 ‘Safe third States’

111 The receiving State is usually the country of origin, that is the State of citizenship¹⁵⁵ or habitual residence including the State which has granted refugee status.¹⁵⁶ If a State party wishes to send a person to a State other than his or her State of origin or residence, it must ensure that this State can be considered a ‘safe third State’, that is a State where the person is not at risk of being subjected to torture or of being expelled to another State, in which a real risk of torture exists.

112 In Tebourski v France the applicant requested not to be returned to his country of origin Tunisia since he feared being retried for the same offences for which he had already been convicted and punished. Even though asylum authorities believed that he ‘could have had reason to fear that he would be retried for the same offences for which he had already been convicted and punished, should he return to his country’,¹⁵⁷ the asylum request was turned down and the State party established Tunisia as the receiving State. The Committee noted that the State party had thereby ‘failed to take account of the universally accepted practice in such cases, whereby an alternative solution is sought with the agreement of the individual concerned and the assistance of the Office of the [UNHCR] and a third country willing to receive the individual who fears for his safety.¹⁵⁸

¹⁵⁴ Wouters (n 107) 510. He refers to the Korban case (n 151) which would imply that a State party should have a high level of certainty that no subsequent removal by the third country to the country of origin will take place. The assessment in this case, however, was based on general information, mainly from the UNHCR (ie, no personal risk was assessed), and the question whether or not the third country is a State party to CAT and whether or not it has accepted the individual complaint procedure seemed to be of relevance.

113 States parties should assess whether the third State's asylum procedures afford sufficient guarantees to avoid the asylum seeker's secondary removal, directly or indirectly, to his or her country of origin, contrary to Article 3. The Committee criticized in its Concluding Observations 'preventive expulsion' to a 'safe third country' if not all asylum seekers had the opportunity to apply for asylum in the third State and thus leaving them without sufficient safeguards against refoulement.¹⁵⁹ It also criticized if in practice the safe third country rule was almost automatically applied—and not after an assessment on a case-by-case basis. States parties should ensure that asylum procedures foresee a substantive review of applications respecting the principle of non-refoulement, irrespective of whether the country of destination is considered safe. Safeguards and remedies should exist in forced return procedures in order to guarantee that no person in need of international protection is returned to a country where he or she is in danger of being subjected to 'acts of torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment, conditions or punishment or to chain refoulement'.¹⁶⁰

114 States parties should ensure sufficient protection from refoulement when implementing multilateral or bilateral agreements. In its Concluding Observations the Committee criticized that asylum seekers whose first application was found inadmissible according to the Dublin II Regulation were in case of repeat application excluded from de facto protection against removal and not afforded an effective remedy¹⁶¹ or that the lodging of an appeal did not have suspensive effect.¹⁶² It also criticized that the suspension of returns under the Dublin II Regulation to Greece due to difficult reception conditions might be terminated prior to the amelioration of the reception conditions.¹⁶³

3.5 Meaning of 'Torture'

3.5.1 Applicability of Article 3 to Cruel, Inhuman and Degrading Treatment

115 The wording of Article 3 suggests that this provision only applies to situations defined in Article 1 CAT. In its case law, the Committee has expressly stated that the scope of Article 3 CAT is limited to torture and does not extend to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment encompassed in Article 16.¹⁶⁴

116 The original Swedish draft wished to protect persons against the danger of being subjected to 'torture or other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment'.¹⁶⁵ This was in line with the jurisprudence of the HRC and regional human rights treaty monitoring bodies derived from the absolute prohibition of torture, cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.¹⁶⁶ The IAPL draft and the revised Swedish draft restricted the protection of refoulement, however, to torture. Although various States, including Canada, Spain, Norway, and Cyprus, during various stages of the drafting process expressed their firm conviction that all forms of ill-treatment prohibited by Article 7 CCPR and Article 16 CAT should be covered by the non-refoulement principle, the majority of States, above all the USA, insisted on a more narrow scope of application restricted to torture in the strict sense.¹⁶⁷

117 General Comment No 1 (1998)—now replaced by General Comment No 4 (see below §§ 118–19)—stipulated that ‘Article 3 is confined in its application to cases where there are substantial grounds for believing that the author would be in danger of being subjected to torture as defined in article 1 of the Convention’.¹⁶⁸ Starting with BS v Canada in 2001,¹⁶⁹ in its jurisprudence the Committee consistently found Article 3 to be applicable to torture only. Whilst in BS v Canada the distinction between torture and other forms of ill-treatment became the compelling argument only at merits stage, other cases were ruled out already at the admissibility stage, when the complaint related to other forms of ill-treatment only and thus did not reach the threshold of torture required for the application of Article 3.¹⁷⁰ However, in General Comment No 2 (2008) the Committee cautioned that ‘[i]n practice, the definitional threshold between ill-treatment and torture is often not clear’¹⁷¹ and that ‘[e]xperience demonstrates that the conditions that give rise to ill-treatment frequently facilitate torture and therefore the measures required to prevent torture must be applied to prevent ill-treatment’.¹⁷²

118 General Comment No 4 (2017) reiterates that the non-refoulement obligation in Article 3 relates to the risk of torture only.¹⁷³ It also notes that ‘Article 3 ... should be without prejudice to Article 16 (2) of the Convention, in particular where a person to be removed would enjoy additional protection, under international instruments or national law, not to be deported to a State where he/she would face a risk of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment’.¹⁷⁴

119 General Comment No 4 furthermore clarifies that other ill-treatment, not amounting to torture, is not irrelevant in the context of Article 3: first, other ill-treatment may change and become torture. In this regard, General Comment No 4 states that:

States parties should consider whether forms of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment that a person facing deportation is at risk of experiencing could likely change so as to constitute torture before making an assessment on each case relating to the principle of ‘non-refoulement’.¹⁷⁵

The argument that the exact characteristics of a future treatment cannot be known to the extent as to determine whether they fulfil all elements of torture is used also by the ECtHR.¹⁷⁶ General Comment No 4 explains that ‘severe pain or suffering cannot always be objectively assessed’ and that

[i]t depends on the negative physical and/or mental repercussions that the infliction of violent or abusive acts has on each individual, taking into account all relevant circumstances of each case, including the nature of the treatment, the sex, age and state of health and vulnerability of the victim or any other status or factors.¹⁷⁷

Secondly, the infliction of other ill-treatment is an indication of a torture risk. General Comment No 4 stipulates that:

the infliction of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatments or punishments, whether or not amounting to torture, to which an individual or his/her family were exposed in their State of origin or would be exposed in the State to which he/she is being deported, constitutes an indication that the person is in danger of being subjected to torture if he/she is deported to one of those States. Such indication should be taken into account by States parties as a basic element justifying the application of the principle of 'non refoulement'.¹⁷⁸

Thirdly, General Comment No 4 stresses that States parties should not adopt 'dissuasive measures or policies ... which would compel persons in need of protection under Article 3 ... to return to their country of origin' despite of their personal risk of torture 'and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment'.¹⁷⁹

120 With similar bearings in mind, in its Concluding Observations, the Committee usually recommends States parties to ensure full protection from refoulement beyond the scope of Article 3 and to ensure that no person in need of protection is returned to a country where he/she is in danger of being subjected to acts of torture or CIDT.¹⁸⁰

121 It can be concluded, therefore, that whilst Article 3 only applies to torture in the strict meaning of Article 1, States parties must exert caution when returning persons to a situation where they would be in danger of being subjected to any form of ill-treatment.

3.5.2 Lawful Sanctions

122 The question whether the lawful sanctions clause in Article 1, which defines the prohibition of torture as excluding the 'pain or suffering arising only from, inherent in or incidental to lawful sanctions', has a bearing on the prohibition of refoulement has been answered by the Committee in both its case-law and Concluding Observations, albeit not in unequivocal terms.¹⁸¹

123 Detention alone falls clearly outside the scope of Article 3, as observed by the Committee in decisions on individual complaints: '... the mere risk of being arrested and tried is not sufficient to conclude that there is also a risk of being subjected to torture'.¹⁸²

See also SRT (Mendez), 'Report of the Special Rapporteur on Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment' (2016) A/HRC/31/57, para 33, where the SRT on his part noted that 'States are prohibited from returning anyone to a situation where there are substantial grounds to believe that the person may be subject to torture or ill-treatment.'

Whilst the Committee routinely takes note of reports on prison conditions in the receiving States, there is no instance where it determined in decisions on individual complaints that prison conditions alone may give rise of an issue under Article 3.¹⁸³ In its State reporting procedure, the Committee has, however, indicated that detention conditions can amount to torture where '[s]uch conditions of detention were described by the Special Rapporteur as constituting additional punishments which can only be qualified as torture as defined in article 1 of the Convention ...'.¹⁸⁴

3.5.3 Corporal and Capital Punishment

124 International case law relating to the non-refoulement principle under Article 3 ECHR and Article 7 CCPR developed first in relation to capital punishment cases (the death row phenomenon¹⁸⁵ and methods of execution¹⁸⁶), which were considered as amounting to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment, but not to torture. In later cases, the HRC extended the principle of non-refoulement to the right to life in Article 6 CCPR.¹⁸⁷

125 The preamble of CAT relates to the prohibition of torture as stipulated by Article 7 CCPR which includes corporal punishment. The lawful sanctions clause in Article 1 CAT, however, gives considerable leeway to national legislations. The Committee encourages—but does not request—some States to abolish the death penalty and corporal punishment.¹⁸⁸

126 The jurisprudence of the Committee implies that the method of carrying out a death penalty can amount to torture. In the case AS v Sweden the Committee considered the return of a woman to Iran where she had been sentenced to death by stoning for adultery. It observed that although the punishment was lawful in Iran, Sweden must not return the applicant to Iran or to any other country where she could be returned to Iran.¹⁸⁹ The Committee here, as in other cases, does not question the legality of the death penalty as such, nor did it enter into any discussion whether stoning amounts to torture or only to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment. It also did not discuss whether this sentence to corporal and capital punishment could perhaps fall under the 'lawful sanctions' clause in Article 1(1) CAT.¹⁹⁰ In other words, the Committee seemingly considered it beyond any doubt that stoning amounts to torture and is, therefore, covered by the non-refoulement principle in Article. Similarly, in Rouba Albaj Ali v Morocco, the Committee considered the risk of the complainant's husband to be subjected to corporal punishment upon extradition to Saudi Arabia, without further qualification of this punishment, to be as such sufficient to warrant non-refoulement.¹⁹¹ It can be inferred that Article 3 CAT applies to all forms of capital and corporal punishment that must be considered torture in the sense of Article 1 CAT.

127 Notwithstanding the applicability of Article 3 to torture only, in its General Comment No 4 the Committee urged States to take into account when considering the removal of a person to another State, certain human rights situations in receiving countries which constitute an indication of a risk of torture, including potential sentences of corporal punishment which amount to torture or CIDT¹⁹² and including where the death penalty is considered a form of torture or CIDT by the sending State.¹⁹³ In the same vein, States parties are requested to consider whether ‘circumstances and the methods of execution of the death penalty and the prolonged period and conditions of the person sentenced to death in death row detention’ could amount to torture or CIDT.¹⁹⁴ Thus whilst Article 3 only relates to torture, the Committee here draws the attention of States to the fact that situations constituting either torture or CIDT must be taken as indicators of the torture risk a person to be returned faces.

128 Furthermore, according to the Committee’s case law, an applicant should not be returned to a State where the death penalty is applied for offences that do not meet international standards for most serious offenses and is applied without due process.^{195,196}

3.5.4 Torture Perpetrated by Non-State Actors

129 Threats of torture at the hands of non-State actors without the consent or acquiescence of the Government usually fall outside the scope of Article 3 CAT since the States parties’ obligation to refrain from refoulement is directly linked to the definition of torture in Article 1. The Committee confirms that ‘an obligation to refrain from expelling a person who might risk pain or suffering inflicted by a non-governmental entity, without the consent or acquiescence of the Government, falls outside the scope of article 3 of the Convention’.¹⁹⁷

130 General Comment No 4 clarifies in this context that torture perpetrated by non-State actors falls outside the scope of Article 3 only if the receiving State is de facto in control of the territory in question: States parties should not deport persons to another State where there are substantial grounds for believing that they would be in danger of being subjected to torture or other ill-treatment at the hands of non-State entities, including groups which are unlawfully exercising actions that inflict severe pain or suffering for purposes prohibited by the Convention, and over which the receiving State has no or only partial de facto control or whose acts it is unable to prevent nor to counter their impunity.¹⁹⁸

¹⁹⁶ The ECtHR, similar to the CAT Committee, clarified that refoulement was strictly prohibited if there was a risk that a person to be transferred would be subjected to an unfair trial that could lead to a death sentence: ‘the mere possibility of the imposition of capital punishment together with the prospect of an unfair trial ... is sufficient in the Court’s view to conclude that such situation generates for the applicant a sufficient anguish and mental suffering to fall within the ambit of Article 3 of the Convention.’ See Koktysh v Ukraine, App no 43707/07 (ECtHR, 10 December 2009) paras 62–64.

131 Therefore, in the case of ‘failed States’ or other situations where the State has lost control over its territory, acts by groups exercising quasi-governmental authority can fall within the definition of Article 1 CAT and thus call for the application of Article 3 CAT. This was the case in *Elmi v Australia*¹⁹⁹ where non-governmental factions exercised certain prerogatives that were comparable to those normally exercised by legitimate Governments and, accordingly, the members of those factions could fall, for the purposes of the application of the Convention, within the phrase ‘public officials or other persons acting in an official capacity’ contained in Article 1 CAT.²⁰⁰ Three years after the Elmi decision, the Committee noted in HMHI v Australia that the central Government had regained its authority and that therefore the acts of the same non-governmental entities now fall outside the scope of Article 3.²⁰¹

132 Not only in the exceptional situations of ‘failed States’ has the Committee accepted claims under Article 3 involving the risk of torture by non-State actors, but also in cases where the State failed to exercise due diligence in preventing and stopping abuses by private actors.²⁰² This approach is also reflected in the Committee’s decisions on cases of victims of gender-based violence. In Njamba and Balikosa v Sweden (2010)²⁰³ and the later cases *EKW v Finland*²⁰⁴ and Bakatu-Bia v Sweden,²⁰⁵ the Committee referred to UN reports finding that violence against women in the DRC was rampant in the east of the country and also widespread in other parts of the country. It found, referring to General Comment No 2, that—even though it was largely perpetrated by non-State actors—the failure of the State to exercise due diligence to intervene resulted in the applicants being at the risk of torture in the event of a return to the DRC.

133 It can therefore be concluded that Article 3 CAT applies not only in cases where there are substantial grounds for believing that the person would run a risk of being tortured by an official, but also when there is a risk of torture by non-State actors when the State fails to apply due diligence to intervene, or when the State is incapable of intervening because it has lost control over the territory to which the applicant is to be returned.

134 The jurisprudence of the ECtHR similarly stipulates that a person must not be returned to a State which is either unwilling or unable to afford protection, even if the danger emanates from non-State actors.²⁰⁶

In MF v Sweden, however, involving a complainant who had been tortured in the past by members of the nationalist BNP party in Bangladesh, the Committee insisted that pain or suffering inflicted by a non-governmental entity, without the consent or acquiescence of the Government, falls outside the scope of Art 3; see also MF v Sweden, No 326/2007 (n 183) para 7.5.

3.6 Probability of the Torture Risk (Risk Assessment)

135 The phrase ‘would be in danger of being subjected to torture’ in Article 3(1) CAT relates to the question of the level of probability of the torture risk. The level of risk was described by the Committee in its General Comment No 1—now replaced by General Comment No 4—as ‘go[ing] beyond mere theory or suspicion, however, the risk does not have to meet the test of being highly probable’.²⁰⁷ The applicant had to establish that ‘such danger is personal and present’.²⁰⁸ In its case law, the Committee usually referred to its General Comment No 1 and sometimes added that the applicant had to face a foreseeable, real and personal risk of being tortured.²⁰⁹ General Comment No 4 (2017) stipulates that ‘[t]he Committee’s practice has been to determine that “substantial grounds” exist whenever the risk of torture is “foreseeable, personal, present and real”’.²¹⁰

136 In its jurisprudence, the Committee does not always use a consistent formulation. The Committee referred in its first decision on the merits regarding Article 3 in Mutombo v Switzerland to circumstances which would have the ‘foreseeable and necessary consequence’ of exposing the author to torture.²¹¹ After this case, the Committee has not referred to the term ‘necessary’ anymore.²¹² It used later on for instance the ‘foreseeable consequence of exposing him to a real [and personal] risk’ (brackets added) of being arrested and tortured²¹³ which became in turn a ‘foreseeable, real [and personal] risk’ (brackets added).²¹⁴ Shortly after this case, in 1998, General Comment No 1 on the implementation of Article 3 was published and this concept was further elaborated as stated above.²¹⁵ Since then the Committee has clarified in its case law that the risk needs to be personal, foreseeable, real, and present.²¹⁶ General Comment No 4 (2017) stipulates that the Committee will 'consider the risk of torture as foreseeable, personal, present and real when the existence of credible facts relating to the risk by itself, at the time of its decision, would affect the rights of the complainant under the Convention in case of his/her deportation'.²¹⁷ In the academic literature it has been criticized that the Committee has in its practice sometimes used different levels of risk.²¹⁸

137 In contrast to the refugee definition of the Refugee Convention, the risk element of Article 3 CAT is an objective element so that the subjective fear of an individual that he or she will be tortured is not taken into account. As detailed below, the existence of a risk is determined by personal elements and the general situation in the receiving country. Apart from that, also credibility of the complaint and the applicant, plausibility, and evidence, but also for instance the availability of an internal protection alternative play a role.

3.6.1 Time of Risk Assessment

138 The time of risk assessment as per practice of the Committee is the time when it prepares its decisions on an individual complaint. It is not the time when the complaint was submitted, nor the time the State party made its assessment of the case in question.²¹⁹ The situation in the receiving country can have changed in the meantime, increasing or decreasing the risk for the applicant. Also, new information with significance for the risk assessment may have come to light meanwhile.

139 Since the time span between the decision of a national authority and of the Committee can be quite long,²²⁰ and an applicant may have been returned at the time of the Committee's consideration of the complaint (be it in the absence of or in disregard of interim measures), the question arises as to how to interpret a situation where significant new facts have emerged meanwhile.

140 The Committee uses events subsequent to the removal of an applicant to either corroborate or refute the information upon which the domestic authorities of the State party based their risk assessment. Thus, the Committee takes decisions 'in the light of the information that was known, or ought to have been known, to the State party's authorities at the time of the removal. Subsequent events are relevant to the assessment of the State party's knowledge, actual or constructive, at the time of removal.'²²¹ The crucial point here is the interpretation of the 'constructive knowledge' a State party's authorities should have had at the time of decision-making about the return of a person, which is ultimately an assessment of the quality of the risk assessment of the State party. From the cases discussed below we see that the Committee itself struggled sometimes with the gap between actual knowledge and the constructive knowledge it should have had when considering individual complaints.

141 In earlier cases the Committee's approach was different—it took events subsequent to a return as evidence for a violation or non-violation of Article 3: In TPS v Canada, the applicant was removed to India despite interim measures of the Committee.²²² A period of two years had elapsed between his return to India and the consideration of his case by the Committee. The Committee found no violation of Article 3 CAT arguing that the fact that the applicant had lived in the receiving State for two years without being subjected to torture showed that it was unlikely that he was still at risk.²²³ Also for instance in the case GK v Switzerland, in which the Committee found no violation of Article 3, the Committee noted that it had not received information on torture or other forms of ill-treatment perpetrated on the applicant—who was sought for her affiliation with ETA—during her incommunicado detention upon extradition to Spain. In light of the fact that the Committee had noted that incommunicado detention increases the risk of torture, and had, in the State reporting procedure, received information about cases of torture and other ill-treatment by security organs and police in Spain,²²⁴ its views in this case do not appear to be conclusive.

In a dissenting opinion, however, Committee member Guibril Camara criticized that: '[t]he fact that in this case the author was not subsequently subjected to torture has no bearing on whether the State party violated the Convention in expelling him. The question of whether the risk—in this case, of acts of torture—actually materializes is of relevance only to any reparation or damages sought by the victim or by other persons entitled to claim . . . The competence of the Committee against Torture should also be exercised in the interests of prevention. In cases relating to Art 3, it would surely be unreasonable to wait for a violation to occur before taking note of it.' See also paras 16.2–16.4.

142 In its landmark decision Agiza v Sweden (2005)²²⁵ the Committee changed its approach and stopped using subsequent events as evidence for a (non-)violation of Article 3. Mr. Agiza, an Egyptian national, was detained in 1982 in connection with the assassination of former Egyptian President Sadat, allegedly tortured in detention and later tried in absentia and sentenced to twenty-five years imprisonment for belonging to the terrorist organization Al-Jihad. He sought asylum in Sweden together with his family in 2000. In 2001, the Government of Sweden rejected the asylum application of Mr. Agiza and his wife on account of security concerns. Mr. Agiza was deported the same day by a privately chartered CIA rendition aircraft to Cairo. The deportation of his wife, Mrs Attia, was ordered to take place as soon as possible, but she evaded police custody and remained with the children in Sweden. In order to comply with the principle of non-refoulement, the Swedish Government had, before executing the expulsion of Mr. Agiza, requested and received diplomatic assurances from the Egyptian authorities to the effect that Mr. Agiza and his family would be treated in accordance with international law upon return to Egypt. A month after his deportation (in January 2002), the Swedish ambassador to Egypt visited Mr. Agiza in pre-trial detention and—as it later came to light—received information about the torture Mr. Agiza was subjected to. This information, contained in a confidential Swedish Government memorandum, was, however, omitted from the monitoring report that the Swedish Government made available to the public.²²⁶

Mr. Agiza's wife, Mrs Attia, in her complaint to the Committee, argued that given the family relationship she would risk torture upon return and that her husband showed physical signs of ill-treatment and reported having been tortured.²²⁷ In November 2003, the Committee decided the case of Attia v Sweden on the basis of all information made available to it at that time.²²⁸ The Committee argued that Article 3 was not violated since family ties were not a sufficient ground for a claim under Article 3 CAT; since diplomatic assurances were provided by Egypt being monitored by the Swedish ambassador;²²⁹ and since the applicant's husband 'medical care and conditions of detention were reported to be adequate'.²³⁰

In June 2003, Mr. Agiza submitted a complaint to the Committee alleging that his removal to Egypt had violated Article 3 CAT. He based his complaint both 'on what was known at the time the complainant was expelled, as viewed in the light of subsequent events' and argued that he 'was in fact subjected to torture after his return'.²³¹ During the proceedings on his case, in 2004, the Committee received a report of the Swedish ambassador on his first monitoring visit to Mr. Agiza in January 2002 contradicting the information the Swedish Government had submitted to the Committee in the proceedings of his wife, Ms Attia. The Ambassador's report contained information of Mr. Agiza reporting torture in detention in Egypt.²³² In its landmark decision of 20 May 2005, the

As revealed later, the chief legal adviser to the Swedish Ministry of Foreign Affairs had argued in December 2004 that the reasons for not communicating the torture allegations to United Nations human rights bodies were to avoid exposing the detainee to an even greater risk, and to not endanger diplomatic relations with Egypt: Human Rights Watch (n 120) 65.

²³² The report further contained information of Mr. Agiza reporting ill-treatment during his apprehension in Sweden and during the rendition flight conducted by US security personnel. The Swedish Government also provided the conclusions of the investigations of the Parliamentary Ombudsman into the circumstances of deportation from Sweden to Cairo which showed that the Swedish Security Police had lost control of the

must be decided in the light of the information that was known, or ought to have been known, to the State party's authorities at the time of the removal. Subsequent events are relevant to the assessment of the State party's knowledge, actual or constructive, at the time of removal.²³³

The Committee noted that the State party knew or should have known that torture in Egypt was widespread, that the risk for detainees held for political and security reasons was particularly high, and that the State party was aware of the interest of the intelligence service of the USA and Egypt in the applicant.²³⁴ The Committee further noted that the facts emerging in the Agiza case also had a bearing on the Attia case. It recalls that it relied on the diplomatic assurances in that case and that at the time of its decision it did not have the evidence at hand which later emerged in the Agiza case, such as the torture allegations contained in the Ambassador's report.²³⁵ Of course the Committee, just as the State party, knew or should have known that torture in Egypt was widespread, particularly against detainees held for security reasons.²³⁶

143 In decisions subsequent to the Agiza case, the Committee adhered to its assessment of actual and constructive knowledge a State party should have had at the time of expulsion.²³⁷ In Abichou v Germany (2013), for example, the Committee did not make its assessment of the quality of the risk assessment carried out by national authorities dependent on subsequent events. It stated that the fact that the torture risk did ultimately not materialize upon extradition 'cannot be justifiably used to call into question or minimize, retrospectively, the existence of such a risk at the time of his extradition'.²³⁸

144 To sum up, the Committee has in most cases not considered events subsequent to removal anymore as an element in its assessment of whether Article 3 was violated or not. Instead, it used information on subsequent events for the assessment what the State party actually knew or should have known at the time of removal.

3.6.2 Relevant Factors for the Risk Assessment

3.6.2.1 Objective and Subjective Test: General Human Rights Situation in Receiving State and Individual Situation

145 According to Article 3(2), domestic authorities 'shall take into account all relevant considerations' when determining whether there are substantial grounds for believing that a torture risk exists. The phrase 'all relevant considerations' goes back to the situation at Bromma airport and that Mr. Agiza had been subjected to inhuman and degrading treatment by CIA personnel on Swedish territory and during the rendition flight.

²³⁴ Agiza v Sweden, No 233/2003 (n 57) para 13.4.

²³⁵ Other information the Committee noted it did not have at the time of the decision of the Attia case was the ill-treatment of Mr. Agiza on the territory of the State party by foreign intelligence agents and the acquiescence of the State party's security organs; information on the involvement of the US intelligence service in the rendition flight. It also stated that at the time of the decision it had only limited information on the cooperation of States in renditions and torture abroad.

²³⁷ See eg Brada v France, No 195/2002 (n 221) para 13.1; Bachan Singh Sogi v Canada, No 297/2006 (n 49) para 10.8.

compromise proposal of the International Commission of Jurists in 1980.²³⁹ The proposal laid out that a consistent pattern of gross human rights violations is not the only decisive factor that should be taken into account in the respective risk assessment. If such a consistent pattern exists, and above all a systematic practice of torture has been identified in a particular country, the burden of proof is on the State party to show that the particular individual concerned is not in danger of being subjected to torture if returned.

146 It has become routine practice of the Committee to remind States parties in its decisions on individual complaints of the dual considerations essential to an adequate risk assessment, namely not only with regard to the general human rights situation but first and foremost also to the specific circumstances of the individual.²⁴⁰ Therefore, ‘all relevant considerations’ include the general human rights situation in the receiving State, the particular circumstances of the individual, and, as per practice of the Committee, also other factors, such as whether or not the receiving State is party to the Convention with the applicant having the legal possibility of applying to the Committee for protection or not,²⁴¹ and whether the State party has made the declaration under Article 22 CAT accepting the individual complaints procedure.²⁴²

147 General Comment No 4 (2017) stipulates categories of ‘information’, which ‘while not exhaustive, would be pertinent’ in the risk assessment.²⁴³ Similar to General Comment No 1 (1998),²⁴⁴ General Comment No 4 mentions the human rights situation in the receiving State;²⁴⁵ past torture or other ill-treatment in the recent past,²⁴⁶ as well as independent evidence to support such a claim;²⁴⁷ activities making the individual particularly vulnerable to torture risk;²⁴⁸ or the credibility of the applicant.²⁴⁹ In addition to categories mentioned already in the General Comment of 1998, General Comment No 4 states also new categories, such as information on whether the applicant had access to all legal and/

However, in the case of Alan v Switzerland the fact that Turkey was a State party to the Convention and had made the declaration under Art 22, was not considered to ‘constitute a sufficient guarantee for the author’s security’. The Committee explained—referring to its findings of its inquiry under Art 20 CAT—that ‘practice of torture is still systematic in Turkey’ and that ‘the main aim and purpose of the Convention is to prevent torture, not to redress torture once it has occurred’. or administrative guarantees and safeguards, in particular, to an independent medical examination to assess claims of previous torture or other ill-treatment;²⁵⁰ information on threat of or exposure to reprisals or other forms of sanctions amounting to ill-treatment in connection with the individual complaint;²⁵¹ information on whether the applicant would upon return be 'at risk of further deportation to another State where he/she would face the risk of being subjected to torture'.²⁵²

148 In the context of Article 3(2), the Committee states in its General Comment No 4 that 'the infliction of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatments or punishments, whether or not amounting to torture' to which a person or family was exposed or would be exposed is an indication of a torture risk, which 'should be taken into account by States parties as a basic element justifying the application of the principle of "non refoulement"'.²⁵³ The Committee also mentions examples of human rights situations²⁵⁴ 'which may constitute an indication of a risk of torture' to which States parties 'should give consideration in their decisions on removal' and 'take them into account when applying the principle of "non-refoulement"'.²⁵⁵

149 In its first Article 3 case decided on the merits and in which the Committee found a violation, in Mutombo v Switzerland, the Committee developed a particular formula for this double test which it has followed with slight modifications in subsequent decisions:

The aim of the determination, however, is to establish whether the individual concerned would be personally at risk of being subjected to torture in the country to which he would return. It follows that the existence of a consistent pattern of gross, flagrant or mass violations of human rights in a country does not as such constitute a sufficient ground for determining that a person would be in danger of being subjected to torture upon his return to that country; additional grounds must exist that indicate that the individual concerned would be personally at risk. Similarly, the absence of a consistent pattern of gross violations of human rights does not mean that a person cannot be considered to be in danger of being subjected to torture in his specific circumstances.²⁵⁶

Modifications in the wording of the ‘Mutombo formula’ are for instance ‘runs a personal risk’,²⁵⁷ ‘personally ... in danger’²⁵⁸ or ‘personally at a foreseeable and real risk’²⁵⁹ (instead of ‘personally at risk’);²⁶⁰ ‘additional grounds must be adduced to show that the individual concerned would be personally at risk’²⁶¹ (instead of ‘additional grounds must exist that indicate that ...’);²⁶² ‘conversely’²⁶³ (instead of ‘similarly’).

150 In the absence of a pattern of gross human rights violations in the receiving State, an individual can still be at risk due to his or her personal circumstances, such as belonging to a specific group²⁶⁴ or having a specific profile.²⁶⁵ Even if the political situation in a country has improved, this does not rule out that a person, due to political affiliation, ethnicity, or otherwise, continues to be at risk.²⁶⁶ Conversely, even in cases where such a pattern is acknowledged to exist in a country or where the human rights situation is found to be difficult, additional grounds must be adduced to show that the individual concerned would be personally at risk.²⁶⁷ Thus, according to the jurisprudence of the Committee, the general human rights situation in the receiving State can strengthen²⁶⁸ or weaken²⁶⁹ a claim of a personal risk but has so far been seldom sufficient by itself. However, there were exceptional cases in which a group as a whole was deemed to be targeted on such a scale that everyone belonging to that group could be considered to be at risk. For example, in the case Njamba and Balikosa v Sweden the Committee referred to the precarious human rights situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC), in particular sexual violence against women (rape and gang rape committed by civilians and men with guns) including in areas not affected by armed conflict, so that the applicants' belonging to the high-risk group of women was sufficient to establish a real personal risk. The Committee concluded that the precarious human rights situation in DRC would make it impossible to identify particular areas which could be considered safe for the applicants in the 'current and evolving situation'.²⁷⁰

151 In other cases where the applicant had failed to demonstrate that personal grounds existed that he or she would be at risk of being subjected to torture if returned, the Committee did not even find it necessary to examine the human rights situation in the country.²⁷¹

152 In some instances, the Committee did not determine the personal risk, in particular, it neither looked in detail into the general human rights situation nor in the individual circumstances. Instead it decided on the merits seemingly on the basis of a non-cooperative stance of the State party. For instance, in the case of Tebourski v France the Committee found a violation of Article 3 and merely referred to the conditions under which the applicant was expelled and the failure of the State party to demonstrate good faith by neglecting interim measures.²⁷² In a few cases, the Committee did not clarify the actual level of risk to be faced by the applicant upon return (eg ‘complete absence of risk’).²⁷³

3.6.2.2 General Human Rights Situation in Receiving State

153 One of the elements to be taken into account in the risk assessment is according to General Comment No 4 (2017) the general human rights situation in the receiving State, in particular the ‘evidence of a consistent pattern of gross, flagrant or mass violations of human rights’ as referred to in Article 3(2) CAT.²⁷⁴ These violations include:

‘(a) widespread use of torture and impunity of its perpetrators; (b) harassment and violence against minority groups; (c) situations conducive to genocide; (d) widespread gender-based violence; (e) widespread use of sentencing and imprisonment of persons exercising fundamental freedoms; and (f) situations of international and non-international armed conflicts.’²⁷⁵

154 In the process of drafting the Convention, the Working Group of the Commission on Human Rights received a proposal of the delegation of the USSR at a meeting in 1979, which sought to define the type of human rights violations that would render a situation relevant to non-refoulement considerations. The text the USSR proposed required an applicant to provide ‘substantial evidence’ of being at risk of torture and linked the evidence required to situations characterized by flagrant and massive violations of human rights brought about when apartheid, racial discrimination or genocide, the suppression of national liberation movements, aggression or the occupation of foreign territory are made State policy.²⁷⁶

The list of human rights violations was based broadly on those mentioned in GA Resolution 32/130 of 16 December 1977,²⁷⁷ which at that time of the Cold War represented the approach of most Socialist and Southern States towards the international protection of human rights. Delegations of Western countries disagreed. The US delegation responded, for instance, by declaring that such a list of State policies would have to include religious persecution, denial of free speech, suppression of political dissent and the free flow of information.²⁷⁸

155 In 1980, the ICJ attempted to contribute to a compromise by replacing the term ‘flagrant and massive violations of human rights’ by ‘a consistent pattern of gross violations of human rights’,²⁷⁹ a phrase borrowed from the confidential communication procedure under ECOSOC Resolution 1503 (XLVIII) of 1970.²⁸⁰ But the reference to particular situations of gross human rights violations, such as apartheid, racial discrimination, or genocide remained in the ICJ draft. Since most Western States were not willing to accept any kind of illustrative list of human rights violations, India and Senegal in 1984 proposed to delete this list altogether. India also suggested to introduce, as a compromise, a new formula of ‘a consistent pattern of gross, flagrant or mass

²⁷³ See eg El Rgeig v Switzerland, No 280/2005 (n 207) para 7.4 (the Committee arrived at a violation of Art 3 arguing that ‘... the State party has not presented to it sufficiently convincing arguments to demonstrate a complete absence of risk’ that the applicant would face torture if returned to Libya); Dadar v Canada, No 258/2004 (n 52). violations of human rights'.²⁸¹ Although many delegations had misgivings about these compromises, they were finally accepted by the Working Group, the Commission and the General Assembly.

156 In fact the words 'consistent pattern of gross' were taken from ECOSOC Resolution 1503 (XLVIII),²⁸² and 'flagrant or mass violations of human rights' were taken from GA Resolution 32/130²⁸³ (as pointed out by the US delegation). In reality, the difference between both approaches is not as big as often assumed during the ideological human rights debates of the Cold War. After all, the breakthrough of the late 1960s which led to the end of the 'no power to take action doctrine' by ECOSOC, explicitly authorizing the Commission on Human Rights to examine gross and systematic human rights violations both in the public 1235 and the confidential 1503 procedures, could only be achieved because illustrative references to apartheid, racial discrimination, and colonialism were attached to the relevant resolutions.²⁸⁴ But soon, ECOSOC Resolution 1235 (XLII) of 1967²⁸⁵ became the legal basis for public discussions and examinations of gross and systematic violations of all human rights in all States of the world. The first so-called thematic mechanisms by the Commission on the basis of ECOSOC Resolution 1235 were established during the early 1980s: in 1980, the Working Group on Enforced or Involuntary Disappearances was established as the first thematic mechanism, followed by the Special Rapporteur on Extrajudicial, Summary or Arbitrary Executions in 1982 and the Special Rapporteur on Torture in 1985.

157 The UN human rights protection system today knows several procedures of responding to the existence of a systematic pattern of gross human rights violations in a country. One is the public condemnation of the country by the Human Rights Council (previously the Commission on Human Rights)²⁸⁶ or the General Assembly as well as the appointment of a country-specific Special Rapporteur, Special Representative, or similar independent expert of the Human Rights Council with the mandate to investigate the overall situation in the country. Another response is the confidential 1503 procedure to which a country can be subjected, with or without an independent expert appointed to investigate the situation.

158 The sources the Committee draws on to evaluate the situation in a country are manifold: it takes into account the reports of the Special Rapporteur on Torture²⁸⁷ or other Special Rapporteurs,²⁸⁸ decisions of other international or regional treaty monitoring bodies, such as the HRC²⁸⁹ or the European²⁹⁰ and Inter-American Human Rights System,²⁹¹ reports of the CPT²⁹² or the SPT. It also relies on assessments of the OHCHR²⁹³ and UN agencies such as UNHCR.²⁹⁴ In the case of Iran, for example, the Committee based its assessment of the actual human rights situation on documents prepared by the OHCHR for the Universal Periodic Review (UPR), and statements of Special Procedure mandate holders of the Human Rights Council, as well as the HRC's Concluding Observations,²⁹⁵ amongst others.²⁹⁶ The reports of State authorities themselves and of diplomatic missions of States parties also play a role,²⁹⁷ as well as of international NGOs such as Amnesty International,²⁹⁸ and local human rights organizations.²⁹⁹ The Committee's own mechanisms also generate information, such as the reporting mechanism under Article 19 and the inquiry mechanism under Article 20 CAT. In individual cases relating to the receiving States Turkey, Mexico, Peru, Egypt, and Sri Lanka, the Committee relied, inter alia, on its own findings in the respective inquiry proceedings under Article 20 CAT.³⁰⁰

159 In its first decision on the merits, in Mutombo v Switzerland, the Committee could already base its assessment on various established UN mechanisms. It referred to the country-specific Special Rapporteur in the assessment of the human rights situation in Zaire, as well as to reports of the Secretary-General, the Working Group on Enforced Disappearances, the Special Rapporteur on Summary Executions and the Special Rapporteur on Torture, all of which led to its conclusion 'that a consistent pattern of pattern of gross, flagrant or mass violations does exist in Zaire and that the situation may be deteriorating'.³⁰¹

160 In evaluating if a situation in a country constitutes a consistent pattern of gross, flagrant, or mass violations of human rights, the Committee bases its assessment on evidence of practices of torture and other forms of prohibited inhuman treatment, including enforced disappearances and summary or arbitrary execution.³⁰²

161 In this regard the notion of 'systematic torture' under Article 20 on the inquiry procedure is particularly informative.³⁰³ In 1992, at its first inquiry procedure under Article 20 of the Convention, the Committee defined systematic torture as follows:

The Committee considers that torture is practiced systematically when it is apparent that the torture cases reported have not occurred fortuitously in a particular place or at a particular time, but are seen to be habitual, widespread and deliberate in at least a considerable part of the territory of

In its inquiry under Art 20 of Nepal, the Committee took into account submissions of stakeholders and the UN to the universal periodic review of Nepal, as well as information provided by the OHCHR, and reports from the Nepal National Human Rights Commission and submissions from NGOs. In the case of the DRC, reports of the High Commissioner for Human Rights and reports of independent UN experts were looked into, and the report of the Independent Expert of the Commission on Human Rights on the situation of human rights in Somalia in the case of Somalia, and the report of the Special Representative of the Commission on Human Rights on the situation of human rights in Iran. the country in question. Torture may in fact be of a systematic character without resulting from the direct intention of a Government. It may be the consequence of factors which the Government has difficulty in controlling, and its existence may indicate a discrepancy between policy as determined by the central Government and its implementation by the local administration. Inadequate legislation which in practice allows room for the use of torture may also add to the systematic nature of this practice.³⁰⁴

162 A comparison between the ten Article 20 CAT inquiries that the Committee has undertaken so far further qualifies the key components of systematic torture as being the habitual, widespread, and deliberate use of torture (although not necessarily resulting from the direct intention of the Government) and inadequate legislation and prevention measures.³⁰⁵

163 The finding of the first type of evidence (habitual, widespread, and deliberate use of torture in at least a considerable part of a country) is usually based on the existence of a great number of allegations, which came from different sources that had proven to be reliable in connection with other activities of the Committee, eg in the case of Egypt in 1996,³⁰⁶ or Peru in 2001.³⁰⁷

164 The second area of concern refers to inadequate legislation and the lack of effective prevention measures.³⁰⁸ In particular, the Committee repeatedly advised States parties to institute access to counsel and free legal assistance to detainees, and prompt and independent investigations of torture allegations, to instruct local law enforcement agents on proper interrogation and investigation techniques.³⁰⁹ For example, the Committee found that in Peru, 'torture is being used extensively in connection with the investigation of acts of terrorism and that those responsible are going unpunished'.³¹⁰ In the complaint of a politically active Togolese applicant, the Committee noted the lack of judicial inquiries into the serious human rights violations committed during and after presidential elections in 2005, and the climate of impunity this created, as well as the non-criminalization of torture in the national legislation.³¹¹ In a complaint of a Turkish applicant, the Committee noted that despite legislative measures taken by the Government, the problem of impunity remained unsolved and questions as to the effectiveness of legal reform persisted.³¹²

165 The Committee also refers to the systematic practice of torture in decisions on individual complaints. For instance, in the case of an Iranian applicant, the systematic practice of torture in Iran is noted along with the general human rights situation including violations of the right to freedom of expression and opinion, peaceful assembly and association, and the application of the death penalty.³¹³ In the case of an Uzbek applicant

the Committee related to its finding in its Concluding Observations on Uzbekistan of routine use of torture and a consistent pattern of gross, flagrant, or mass human rights violations.³¹⁴

166 The Committee frequently relies on evidence of practices which indicate that either the legal framework or policies in place are ineffective, for example when arbitrary detentions, lack of legal assistance to detainees, lack of effective investigations into torture allegations, and a lack of prosecutions of perpetrators undermine the prevention of torture.^{315,316}

167 Similarly, the Committee has taken into account the general situation of chaos and the lack of a functioning Government (failed States) read together with the vulnerability of certain groups.³¹⁷ The Committee in the case of Somalia determined later cases differently as the political situation had changed and a functioning Government had taken over control.³¹⁸

168 In cases where the Committee does not explicitly use the wording of Article 3(2) CAT, it does not necessarily mean that there does not exist a consistent pattern of gross, flagrant, or mass violations of human rights in the receiving State. The Committee has also used the wording of ‘widespread violations of human rights’³¹⁹ in the case of Somalia, or ‘an extremely worrisome’ human rights situation³²⁰ in Iran or, in earlier cases, ‘serious human rights situation’³²¹ in Iran. It also spoke of a ‘dire human rights situation’³²² and a ‘precarious human rights situation’³²³ (referring to the DRC), a poor human rights record and a generally unstable human rights situation in the case of Burundi,³²⁴ a worrying human rights situation in Togo³²⁵ and in Guinea.³²⁶ In order to point out that the human rights situation in a country was serious, the Committee also expressed that it was ‘deeply concerned’³²⁷ or ‘concerned’³²⁸ (with reference to Ethiopia and Yemen), ‘seriously concerned’³²⁹ (with reference to Sri Lanka), or that a human rights situation remained a ‘matter of concern in several aspects’ (relating in particular to the Northern Caucasus ³¹⁶ Internal armed conflicts are breeding grounds for such practices. In the case of El Salvador, the Committee in 2005 noted that, while there had been a consistent pattern of gross, flagrant or mass violations of human rights during the internal conflict in the country in the past, this could not be said to be the case any longer. The Committee explained that the general situation had changed since the peace accords came into effect in 1992 and referred to the fact that the former guerrilla group FMLN had won the majority in the 2003 parliamentary elections. region of Russia,³³⁰ and to Belarus³³¹). The Committee regularly points out that the States parties themselves show awareness of recent developments in the receiving State (for instance that the State party in the case of an individual to be returned to Iran recognized ‘that the human rights situation in Iran is worrisome on many levels’³³²), also with regard to deteriorations.³³³ In the case of Syria, for example, the Committee recalled its concern about allegations of routine torture in its Concluding Observations on Syria in 2010 but noted that a year later, when issuing its decisions on an individual complaint that the human rights situation in Syria had seriously deteriorated.³³⁴

3.6.2.3 Past Torture or Other Ill-treatment

169 Another element to be taken into account in the personal risk assessment is according to General Comment No 4 whether ‘the complainant [has] been tortured or ill-treated by or at the instigation of or with the consent or the acquiescence (tacit agreement) of a public official or other person acting in an official capacity in the past’ and if yes, whether this was in the recent past.³³⁵ Further, the Comment stipulates that it is also relevant whether there ‘[i]s . . . medical or psychological or other independent evidence to support a claim . . . that he/she has been tortured or ill-treated in the past’ and whether ‘the torture [has] had after-effects’.³³⁶

170 Past experiences of torture or other ill-treatment make a person particularly vulnerable to torture upon return. In several individual complaint cases the Committee—in arriving at a finding of a violation of Article 3 CAT—took past torture or other ill-treatment into account.³³⁷ Still, they form only one of the elements to be taken into account in the risk assessment.³³⁸ The lack of any past experiences of torture or other ill-treatment may undermine the existence of a personal risk.³³⁹ The Committee has also stressed that even if the applicant was tortured or otherwise ill-treated in the past,³⁴⁰ this does not necessarily mean that she or he is at the time of decision-making still at risk.³⁴¹ The relevant question would be whether the applicant ‘currently runs a risk of torture upon return’.³⁴² For this reason, the Committee sometimes leaves it open (or at least does not explicitly state) whether the applicant was actually tortured in the past.³⁴³

171 As stipulated in General Comment No 4, the Committee takes into account whether experiences of torture or other ill-treatment took place in the recent past (see above, § 169). In its case law, for instance, a lapse of time of six years or more between the last torture experience in the receiving country and the Committee’s decision was considered to be not recent enough³⁴⁴ while a lapse of time of four years was considered in some cases to be sufficiently recent,³⁴⁵ in others not.³⁴⁶ Torture taking place in the distant past can still be relevant in the risk assessment, for example if the general human rights situation is poor or if opposition activities continue to exist.³⁴⁷

172 The Committee takes also the quality and quantity of past experiences of torture or other ill-treatment into account. In particular, rape or other forms of sexual abuse are often considered in the Committee’s case law.³⁴⁸ Apart from that, the Committee also takes after-effects of such experiences such as post-traumatic stress³⁴⁹ or physical ailments³⁵⁰ into account when assessing the torture risk.³⁵¹

3.6.2.4 Activities and Personal Factors Making the Individual Particularly Vulnerable to Torture Risk

173 Another element to be taken into account in the personal risk assessment is, according to General Comment No 4, the question whether the applicant ‘engaged in political or other activities within or outside the State concerned which would appear to make him/her vulnerable to the risk of being subjected to torture were he/she to be expelled, returned or extradited to the State in question’.³⁵² General Comment No 4 further stipulates a non-exhaustive list of possible ‘[i]ndications of personal risk’:

(a) the complainant’s ethnic background; (b) political affiliation or political activities of the complainant and/or his family members; (c) arrest warrant without guarantee of a fair treatment and trial; (d) sentence in absentia; (e) sexual orientation and gender identity; (f) desertion from the army or armed groups; (g) previous torture; (h) incommunicado detention or other form of arbitrary and illegal detention in the country of origin; (i) clandestine escape from the country of origin for threats of torture; (j) religious affiliation; (k) violations of the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion ... (l) risk of expulsion to a third country where the person may be in danger of being subjected to torture and (m) violence against women, including rape.³⁵³

174 Political activities including associated political affiliation,³⁵⁴ in particular opposition activities, including in the country of refuge,³⁵⁵ desertion from the army, conviction of anti-State crimes,³⁵⁶ or internal exile³⁵⁷ may increase the risk of torture. However, the mere risk of being interrogated or arrested and tried is not sufficient by itself for the Committee to conclude that there is also a torture risk.³⁵⁸ The fact that the receiving State is searching for the applicant or has brought criminal charges against him or her are indications of a personal risk, in particular if politically motivated and without the guarantee of a fair treatment and trial.³⁵⁹ Also a sentence in absentia or a disproportionate sentence may indicate that a personal risk exists.³⁶⁰ Various aspects are important in the risk assessment, in particular the level of responsibility and engagement as well as the type and scale of activities.³⁶¹ Political leadership or membership in a political organization or party, in particular in an opposition party,³⁶² but also the mere commissioning of minor activities such as participating in demonstrations, or only sympathizing and distributing leaflets can be of relevance in the risk assessment. For the Committee it is of importance whether the applicant would attract the interest of the authorities of the receiving State upon return.³⁶³ The 'decisive factor in assessing the risk of torture ... is whether the person occupies a position of particular responsibility in a movement opposing the regime and thus poses a threat to it'.³⁶⁴ The Committee assesses whether the profile of the applicant is sufficiently high or whether the activities were of such significance to attract the interests of the authorities and put them at risk of torture upon return.³⁶⁵ In assessing whether the profile is sufficiently high, the Committee also takes into account whether criminal justice authorities were recently looking for the applicant or whether the applicant is well-known to authorities of the receiving State because of his or her political activities (including in the country of refuge).³⁶⁶ However, under certain circumstances a low political profile may suffice for establishing a torture risk.³⁶⁷

175 Leaving the country of origin in a clandestine or illegal manner may increase the risk of torture.³⁶⁸ The Committee regards the issuance of a passport and being in a position to leave the country freely as one of the indicators that no personal risk of torture exists.³⁶⁹

176 Also journalistic activities may make the applicant particularly vulnerable to torture risk, in particular if they draw the attention of the authorities of the receiving State to the applicant.³⁷⁰

177 Not only political activities within³⁷¹ the country of origin but also those committed subsequent to the flight, including in the country of refuge,³⁷² can be relevant in the context of Article 3.³⁷³

178 In its jurisprudence, the Committee has taken personal factors such as ethnic background,³⁷⁴ religion or religious affiliation,³⁷⁵ family ties,³⁷⁶ or sexual orientation,³⁷⁷ into account in assessing the torture risk upon return. For instance, the ethnic origin of an applicant, a person of Armenian origin living in Azerbaijan, combined with experiences of torture and other ill-treatment of the applicant and his family were sufficient for the Committee to arrive at a violation of Article 3 CAT. In this context, the Committee took information on the widespread hostile attitude on part of the general public towards ethnic Armenians and the risk of discrimination in daily life into account.³⁷⁸

179 In its jurisprudence, the Committee has also taken gender and in particular violence against women, including rape, into account. It arrived at a violation of Article 3 CAT mainly on account of the applicant's belonging to the group of women in a country with widespread violence against women (DRC).³⁷⁹

180 A claim under Article 3 CAT on account of family relationship by itself is normally not enough to establish a personal risk.³⁸⁰ Additional elements such as political activity are deemed necessary. For instance, in Paetz v Sweden the applicant came from a politically active family,³⁸¹ was a member of the Sendero Luminoso, and participated in a demonstration where he handed out leaflets and handmade bombs. The Committee took also into account that other family members were targeted.³⁸² In Kalonzo v Canada, the applicant was the son of a leader of the Union for Democracy and Social Progress in

DRC, a Luba from Kasai, and had already been the victim of violence during his detention.³⁸³ In another case, the Committee stated that it was not unlikely that the applicant would still attract the interest of the Egyptian authorities due to his family relationship with the convicted murderer of President al-Sadat (even though the events took place a long time ago) but also because he had via internet, during his stay in his country of refuge, questioned whether the real murderers of President al-Sadat were convicted and punished.³⁸⁴ Also experiences of torture or other ill-treatment of family members or the fact that family members are being targeted by authorities of the receiving State³⁸⁵ (or the lack thereof)³⁸⁶ have been taken into account by the Committee.

181 The Committee has also taken the recognition as a refugee in accordance with the Refugee Convention into account. In Pelit v Azerbaijan, the Committee noted that the applicant was recognized as a refugee in Germany given the risk of persecution upon return to Turkey and that her refugee status remained valid when Azerbaijan deported her to Turkey. The Committee, referring to EXCOM Conclusion No 12(f) of UNHCR ‘On the extraterritorial effect of the determination of refugee status’, noted that ‘[t]he State party has not shown why this principle was not respected . . . in circumstances where the general situation of persons such as the complainant and the complainant’s own past experiences raised real issues under article 3’.³⁸⁷ This despite the fact that persecution is a broader concept than torture. The Committee has also referred in its case law to the recognition of other family members as refugees³⁸⁸ or the recognition of other members of the same group as refugees.³⁸⁹

182 The Committee has also considered the extent of publicity an individual case has received³⁹⁰ or the fact that the applicant has published articles in which his or her name and telephone number were mentioned.³⁹¹

183 For a very long time, the membership to a particular group (which as a whole runs a substantial risk) has not been sufficient for the Committee to find a violation of Article 3 CAT: For instance, in Elmi v Australia, the Committee based the risk assessment mainly on the general human rights situation in Somalia, in particular Mogadishu, and the fact that the applicant was a member of a small clan threatened by armed factions of another clan. Still, important elements in finding a violation of Article 3 CAT were the fact that the applicant’s family was targeted in the past as well as the wide publicity of the applicant’s case.³⁹² In another case, the Committee agreed with the State party that ‘the likelihood of torture of Tamils in Colombo who belong to a “high risk” group is not so great that the group as a whole runs a substantial risk of being so exposed'.³⁹³ However, more recently, the Committee came close to the recognition that a group as a whole, concretely women in the DRC, would be targeted on such a scale that everyone belonging to it could be considered to be at risk. The Committee referred to the widespread precarious human rights situation in DRC, in particular sexual violence against women (rape and gang rape committed by civilians and men with guns) including in areas not affected by armed conflict, so that the applicants' belonging to the group of women was sufficient to establish a real personal risk. The Committee concluded that this situation of widespread violence against women would make it impossible to identify particular areas, which could be considered safe for the applicants in the 'current and evolving situation'.³⁹⁴

3.6.3 Internal Flight Alternative

184 In the jurisprudence of the Committee the concept of internal flight alternatives³⁹⁵ plays a role when the risk for the applicant might not be present in the whole territory of a State but only in certain regions. The internal flight alternative is the option of the individual to relocate to an area other than his/her former place of residence and lead a life free from torture there. A return of the individual to the country of origin where an internal flight alternative exists does, according to the decisions on individual cases brought before the Committee, not constitute a breach of Article 3 CAT.

185 From the case law of the Committee it can be deduced that the most important criterion for the determination of an available internal flight alternative is the ability and willingness of the receiving State to protect the individual against non-State perpetrators.³⁹⁶ When the risk emanates from non-State actors, an internal flight alternative may be available to the persecuted individual as the reach of non-State actors will often not extend to the whole territory of the State, for example in cases where the State is, due to civil unrest, only in control of parts of the country.

186 The risk of torture by non-State actors was considered in both *Elmi v Australia*³⁹⁷ and HMHI v Australia which concerned applicants to be returned to Somalia. In HMHI v Australia, unlike Elmi, the Committee found that a return would not violate Article 3 CAT. While the Committee still considered that there existed a consistent pattern of gross, flagrant, or mass violations of human rights in Somalia, it took note of the fact that the State party intended to return him through a UNHCR voluntary repatriation programme not to Mogadishu, but to an area of Somalia of his choice. The distinguishing feature between HMHI v Australia and Elmi was that Somalia was no longer a 'failed State' but had established in the interim a Transitional National Government which meant that ³⁹³ SS and SA v Netherlands, No 142/1999, UN Doc CAT/C/26/D/142/1999, 11 May 2001, para 6.6. In more recent cases concerning Sri Lankans of Tamil ethnicity, the Committee noted that only those 'with a prior personal or familial connection to LTTE' may face a torture risk: see eg RK v Australia, No 609/2014 (n 82) para 8.6; T v Australia, No 599/2014 (n 85), para 8.11; JN v Denmark, No 628/2014 (n 85) para 7.9.

³⁹⁴ Njamba and Balikosa v Sweden, No 322/2007 (n 203) para 9.5. Similar: Bakatu-Bia v Sweden, No 379/2009 (n 205) paras 10.6–10.7; EKW v Finland, No 490/2012 (n 204) paras 9.6–9.7.

³⁹⁵ The concept of an internal flight alternative is not explicitly mentioned in the 1951 Refugee Convention but plays a role in refugee status determination procedures of States parties. See also UNHCR, 'Guidelines on International Protection: "Internal Flight or Relocation Alternative" within the Context of Article 1A(2) of the 1951 Convention And/Or 1967 Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees'.

the risk of torture from non-governmental entities (as argued by the applicant) would now in Somalia commonly fall outside the scope of Article 3 CAT.³⁹⁸

187 By comparison, in the case Salah Sheekh v Netherlands the ECtHR found that the State party's intention to expel the applicant to a region in Somalia that it considered relatively safe would be a violation of the non-refoulement principle. The Court accepted that parts of Somalia, notably Somaliland and Puntland, could be considered safer than others, but only to individuals hailing from clans of those regions. The Court considered the responsibilities of the State sending someone to a particular region of a country as being the same as in the case of a removal to an intermediary country, and that for relying on an internal flight alternative certain guarantees have to be in place, namely that the person to be expelled must be able to travel to the area concerned and gain admittance and settle there.³⁹⁹

188 Thus, the ECtHR goes a step further in defining the obligations of the sending State than the Committee by including considerations of whether the internal flight alternative is practically, legally, and safely accessible, and whether the person concerned is able to settle there.⁴⁰⁰

189 When the risk of torture emanates from State actors, however, the CAT Committee takes into consideration whether these State actors have local leverage only, such as local police, or whether they operate nationwide and could therefore pose a risk to the person in the whole territory of the State. The Committee also takes into account the degree of interest these State actors could have in the individual.⁴⁰¹

190 In BSS v Canada, a case involving a Sikh applicant from Punjab who was persecuted by Punjabi police but did not display a high political profile, the Committee acknowledged the applicant's risk of torture in Punjab given the evidence submitted including the continued harassment of his family. The Committee noted, however, that the applicant's claims and evidence only related to the risk he faced in Punjab. The Committee considered that the applicant failed to substantiate that he did not have the option of leading a life free from torture in other parts of India and concluded that 'the mere fact that he may not be able to return to his family and his home village does not as such amount to torture within the meaning of article 3'.⁴⁰²

191 In SSS v Canada, also involving a Sikh person politically active in Punjab, the Committee established more clearly that the political profile of an applicant can determine if the internal flight alternative is an option.⁴⁰³ In Singh Khalsa et al v Switzerland—a case involving Sikh separatists who had hijacked a plane—the Committee found that a removal of the applicants to India would constitute a violation of Article 3. It based its view on following elements: the applicants were clearly known to the criminal justice authorities in India as Sikh militants; the authorities maintained an interest in them; persons with a similar profile had been arrested upon return at the airport in India and detained and charged with various offences; according to reports of the SRT ill-treatment and torture in detention continued to be a problem in India, as well as impunity of perpetrators and lack of effective investigations into the acts. The State party had argued that the situation in Punjab—the region in the focus of the applicants' militancy—had improved but the Committee considered the applicants to be at risk of being tortured upon return regardless of whether they would move to other parts of India. This was because of their high profile and the continued interest of the authorities. Also consideration of the fact that India is not State party to CAT played a role.⁴⁰⁴ Similarly, the Committee in NS v Canada stated that the removal to an area of a State where the person would not be exposed to torture, as he or she might be in other areas of the same State, 'is not an admissible option unless the Committee has received reliable information before the deportation that the State of return has taken effective measures able to guarantee full and sustainable protection of the rights of the person concerned'.⁴⁰⁵

192 General Comment No 4 considers an internal flight alternative⁴⁰⁶ to be 'not reliable or effective'.⁴⁰⁷ Furthermore, it stipulates that '[t]he notion of "local danger" does not provide for measurable criteria and is not sufficient to dissipate totally the personal danger of being tortured'.^{408,409} The Committee—in 'assessing whether "substantial grounds" exist ... considers that a receiving State should have demonstrated certain essential measures to prevent and prohibit torture throughout the entire territory under its jurisdiction, or control or authority'.⁴¹⁰

⁴⁰⁴ See Singh Khalsa et al v Switzerland, No 336/2008 (n 241); see also Nirmal Singh v Canada, No 319/2007 (n 257), where the Committee equally decided that the applicant, a Sikh priest and former local leader of the Akali Dal party, had a profile sufficiently high to put him at risk of torture anywhere in India if arrested, compounded by evidence of arrests of the applicant in different provinces and the continued interest of the authorities in him after his departure from the country; and Chahal v UK, App no 22414/93 (ECtHR, 01 September 1994).

⁴⁰⁶ The Committee defines an internal flight alternative as 'the deportation of a person or a victim of torture to an area of a State where he/she would not be exposed to torture unlike in other areas of the same State' see CAT/C/GC/4 (n 2) para 47.

⁴⁰⁸ ibid., para 46 ('When assessing whether "substantial grounds" exist, the Committee will take into account the human rights situation ... as a whole and not of a particular area of it. The State party is responsible for any territory under its jurisdiction, or control or authority ...').

⁴⁰⁹ The lack of clearly defined criteria of what constitutes a 'local danger' played a role in Kalonzo v Canada, No 343/2008 (n 58), for example, where the Committee, dismissing the State party's argument that the applicant could resettle in Kinshasa, did not consider the applicant to be safe in the DRC where he was to be deported to, due to three main factors: for being the son of a political leader, for being a Luba from Kasai and because he had already previously experienced torture whilst in detention in Kinshasa. See Kalonzo v Canada, No 343/2008 (n 58) para 9.7. See also Uttam Mondal v Sweden, No 338/2008 (n 257) para 7.4. The ECtHR, in comparison, rejects an internal protection alternative to be accessible when it is State actors who pose a risk to the individual. In Chahal v UK a Sikh nationalist to be returned to India was considered to be at particular risk in Punjab but also not safe anywhere in India where, according to the SRT, torture in police custody was endemic. Similarly, in Hilal v United Kingdom, the applicant from Zanzibar was considered to be at risk also in mainland Tanzania as the police there was regarded as institutionally linked to the police in Zanzibar. See Hilal v United Kingdom App no 45276/99 (ECtHR, 6 March 2001) para 67; Chahal v UK, App no 22414/93, ECtHR (n 404) paras 103–05.

⁴¹⁰ CAT/C/GC/4 (n 2) para 48. It mentions as examples 'clear legislative provisions on the absolute prohibition of torture and its punishment with adequate penalties, measures to put an end to the impunity for acts of torture, violence and other illegal practices committed by public officials, the prosecution of public officials allegedly responsible for acts of torture and other ill-treatment and their punishment commensurate with the gravity of the crime committed when they are found guilty.'

3.6.4 Refoulement and Asylum Procedure

193 The personal scope of the Refugee Convention is narrower than the personal scope of Article 3 CAT. Article 1A(2) of the Refugee Convention defines a refugee as a person who has a ‘well-founded fear of being persecuted for reasons of race, religion, nationality, membership of a particular social group or political opinion’, is outside his or her country of origin and is ‘unable or, owing to such fear . . . unwilling to avail himself of the protection of that country’. Still, there is a possible overlap between both categories: refugees who have been persecuted or fear persecution on any of the grounds mentioned above have often been subjected to torture. If the request for protection under the Refugee Convention is dismissed by domestic authorities of the country of refuge, Article 3 CAT may,

[a]s a complementary protection mechanism . . . provide relief for those who are unable to demonstrate a link between torture (as a form of persecution) and one of the five 1951 Convention grounds; those overlooked as refugee due to narrow domestic interpretations of the Convention definition; and those expressly excluded from the Convention.⁴¹¹

Even though Article 3 CAT ‘was not conceived as an alternative protection mechanism’ it has ‘spawned an extensive jurisprudence, both at the international and domestic levels’.⁴¹² An example of domestic jurisprudence is Hong Kong case law, where the Refugee Convention does not apply and where courts—starting with the famous Prabakar judgment⁴¹³—developed important jurisprudence on Article 3 CAT of relevance for asylum seekers.⁴¹⁴

194 In contrast to the Refugee Convention, Article 3 CAT is absolute and does not allow any exceptions to the principle of non-refoulement.⁴¹⁵

195 Governments sometimes argue that complaints regarding Article 3 CAT to the CAT Committee have been misused by asylum seekers.⁴¹⁶ The first cases of asylum seekers who had successfully invoked a violation of Article 3 CAT before the CAT Committee led to a significant increase in the number of Article 3 complaints.⁴¹⁷ Indeed, asylum seekers whose asylum requests are dismissed by domestic authorities often turn to international human rights treaty monitoring bodies, such as the CAT Committee, by invoking the non-refoulement principle. This can be explained as follows: first, there is a material overlap—despite the clear legal distinction—between proceedings relating to international protection under the Refugee Convention and non-refoulement proceedings under international human rights law, such as CAT.

Second, there is a lack of an international individual complaints procedure against domestic asylum decisions.⁴¹⁸

196 In response to Governments arguing that the individual complaints procedure in relation to Article 3 CAT has been abused by asylum seekers, the Committee has made clear that the security of applicants and the prevention of torture (rather than redress) is of major importance:⁴¹⁹ in this regard, the Committee noted in its case law that it ‘certainly does not take lightly concern on the part of the State party that article 3 of the Convention might be improperly invoked by asylum seekers’ but that it ‘is of the opinion that, even though there may be some remaining doubt as to the veracity of the facts adduced by the author . . . it must ensure that his security is not endangered’.⁴²⁰ In order to do the latter, ‘it is not necessary that all the facts invoked by the author should be proved; it is sufficient that the Committee should consider them to be sufficiently substantiated and reliable’.⁴²¹

197 In order to delimit itself from refugee determination procedures, the Committee has made clear that ‘its authority does not extend to a determination of whether or not the claimant is entitled to asylum under the national laws of a country, or can invoke the protection of the Geneva Convention relating to the Status of Refugees’.⁴²² It also stated that if the applicant’s arguments are ‘solely [based] on asylum and did not invoke the right protected by article 3 of the Convention’⁴²³ the complaint is inadmissible under Article 22 CAT.⁴²⁴ The Committee has also stressed in its case law that a finding of a violation of Article 3 CAT ‘in no way affects the decision(s) of the competent national authorities concerning the granting or refusal of asylum’ and ‘has a declaratory character’ only so that ‘the State party is not required to modify its decision(s) concerning the granting of asylum’.⁴²⁵

198 The Committee has stated in its case law that while a State party does not have to modify its decision regarding the granting of asylum after the finding of a violation of Article 3 CAT, ‘it does have a responsibility to find solutions that will enable it to take all necessary measures to comply with the provisions of article 3 of the Convention’.⁴²⁶ The Committee clarified that such solutions ‘may be of a legal nature (eg decision to admit the applicant temporarily), but also of a political nature (eg action to find a third State willing to admit the applicant to its territory and undertaking not to return or expel him in its turn)’.⁴²⁷ In a later decision the Committee noted that a ‘temporary permit for medical treatment is not sufficient to fulfil the State party’s obligations under article 3 of the Convention’.⁴²⁸ Still, the Committee did not say which immigration status would be necessary to comply with Article 3 CAT. In general, the principle of non-refoulement in international human rights instruments has led to the introduction of protection status for individuals who benefit from this principle but who do not qualify for protection under the Refugee Convention. At EU level, for instance, subsidiary protection status was introduced in the so-called Qualification Directive.⁴²⁹

3.6.5 Diplomatic Assurances

199 In the context of the transfer of persons from one State to another, be it in the course of a deportation of an alien, an extradition of a suspect, or others, diplomatic assurances are agreements between the sending and the receiving State to guarantee that the transferee is 'treated in accordance with conditions set by the sending State or, more generally, in keeping with its human rights obligations under international law'.⁴³⁰ According to General Comment No 4 the notion 'diplomatic assurances' 'refers to a formal commitment by the receiving State to the effect that the person concerned will be treated in accordance with conditions set by the sending State and in accordance with international human rights standards'.⁴³¹

200 Diplomatic assurances are a useful tool in extradition cases for the purpose of ensuring that the requested State will refrain from subjecting the person concerned to the death penalty. In relation to torture, the situation is different. First, often, the Minister for Foreign Affairs or other Government officials providing diplomatic assurances do not have the factual power over the security and intelligence forces to ensure that torture is not applied. Secondly, torture is usually surrounded by secrecy, which makes effective post-return monitoring difficult. Occasional visits by diplomatic personnel, NGOs, or trained prison inspectors, even if they take place on a daily basis, are no 'watertight' safeguard against torture. Finally, States which seek diplomatic assurances from countries known for their torture practices have a keen interest to expel, 'render', or return the persons concerned from their own territory and, therefore, are not that much interested in finding out the truth about what really happened to the person concerned.

201 The Committee does not categorically reject diplomatic assurances as a guarantee in extradition or deportation procedures. It has, however, consistently argued that diplomatic assurances do not absolve a sending State from carrying out the risk assessment mandated by the non-refoulement principle. In other words, diplomatic assurances cannot be the only safeguard relied upon when transferring a person to the authorities of another State: '... diplomatic assurances cannot be used as a justification for failing to apply the principle of non-refoulement as set forth in article 3 of the Convention.'⁴³² Similarly, the UN General Assembly agrees that 'diplomatic assurances, where used, do not release States from their obligations under international human rights, humanitarian and refugee law, in particular the principle of non-refoulement'.⁴³³

202 The Committee's stance is unequivocal in rejecting diplomatic assurances as a means of securing protection from States 'where there are substantial grounds for believing that a person would be at risk of torture or ill-treatment upon return to the State concerned ...'.⁴³⁴ Where a State has been found to violate international law by perpetrating torture, it certainly cannot be expected to respect bilateral agreement. The Committee repeatedly pointed out that in cases where the risk of torture is found to be manifest (where there are substantial grounds for believing that a person would be in danger of being subjected to torture), diplomatic assurances do not constitute a measure of protection.⁴³⁵ Thus, where the receiving State displays a situation of flagrant human rights violations, and the applicant discharged his or her burden of proof that his/her personal risk is real and foreseeable, diplomatic assurances are not a reliable safeguard.⁴³⁶

203 General Comment No 4 stipulates that diplomatic assurances from a State party to the Convention to which a person is to be deported should not be used as a loophole to undermine the principle of non-refoulement ... where there are substantial grounds for believing that he/she would be in danger of being subjected to torture in that State.⁴³⁷

204 States parties were consistently found to violate Article 3 CAT when they relied on diplomatic assurances without carrying out an individualized risk assessment and without setting up a monitoring mechanism of the implementation of the assurances, and when the serious interest of the State in the well-being of the transferred person was therefore not demonstrated.

205 In Régent Boily v Canada, the Committee noted that a request for diplomatic assurances is already an indication that there are doubts about the treatment of detainees in the recipient country (in the particular case, the applicant had already been tortured in the recipient country), and that such a request therefore means that the sending State is already alerted to a potentially high risk.⁴³⁸

206 Diplomatic assurances of a 'general, unspecific nature'⁴³⁹ are insufficient and States which sought diplomatic assurances are obliged to carry out a follow-up to the situation of the person once the transfer has occurred.⁴⁴⁰ The Committee criticized States when the situation was not monitored, or when the monitoring fell short of being ‘objective, impartial and sufficiently trustworthy’,⁴⁴¹ also from the perspective of the returned person.⁴⁴² A well-designed monitoring system must be part and parcel of any diplomatic assurance agreement. In Régent Boily v Canada, the Committee notes in particular that monitoring must set in from the moment of handover of the person to the authorities of the receiving State.⁴⁴³ In some cases where the Committee found States parties violating the non-refoulement principle by relying on diplomatic assurances only, it, instead of wholly rejecting seeking diplomatic assurances, requested them to review their system of diplomatic assurances.⁴⁴⁴

207 In order to be able to assess whether diplomatic assurances in a particular case are sufficiently detailed, effective, and reliable, the Committee has also insisted on being provided with the actual documents.⁴⁴⁵ The Committee criticized in its State reporting procedure the lack of transparency in transfers of persons to other countries based on diplomatic assurances, and therefore repeatedly requested information on and numbers of transferred persons,⁴⁴⁶ particularly so in the context of renditions.⁴⁴⁷ In a quest to shed light on the extent and nature of extraordinary renditions in the aftermath of 9/11, the Committee requested a number of States to provide information on and numbers of diplomatic assurances received and which countries issued them in the context of the transfer of persons. The Committee advised States to not rely on diplomatic assurances from requesting States where there is a risk of torture because diplomatic assurances will not exempt them from being held responsible for possible breaches of Article 3 CAT and reiterated that ‘those assurances cannot be an instrument to modify a determination of a possible violation of article 3 of the Convention’.⁴⁴⁸

208 Whether diplomatic assurances constitute binding legal obligations remains contested.⁴⁴⁹ In the event of the receiving State breaching given assurances, the sending State will not only have limited legal means available to enforce compliance (they could consider State-initiated complaints under the CAT or the CCPR), but their motivation to seek adjudication will be limited for political reasons and because of the likeliness that they themselves will be found responsible for the person’s fate by returning him/her in the first place.

209 Therefore, in cases of non-compliance with the diplomatic assurances provided, both the sending and the receiving State have little interest in bringing this to light. Consequences are rare, the Arar case⁴⁵⁰ being one of the few examples where the torture of the person upon return did make the sending State (the US) rethink their return policies.⁴⁵¹

210 The Committee's criteria in assessing the reliability of diplomatic assurances as discussed above were not least refined after the occurrences in the cases of Attia v Sweden and Agiza v Sweden,⁴⁵² where it was only because of the activities of NGOs and the media that the true facts about the 'extraordinary rendition' of Mr. Agiza and his treatment by Egyptian security officers came to light. The two cases showed that genuine monitoring of diplomatic assurances in the best interest of the returned person is sometimes not in the interest of the sending State. The Committee had made its assessment in Attia based on the information available to it and was 'satisfied by the provision of guarantees against abusive treatment, which ... are, at the present time, regularly monitored by the State party's authorities in situ'.⁴⁵³ The Committee, however, did at that time not have access to certain documents withheld by the Swedish Government which would have revealed from the very beginning that Mr. Agiza was actually tortured and that the diplomatic assurances by Egypt were ineffective. It concluded in Agiza that '[t]he procurement of diplomatic assurances, which, moreover, provided no mechanism for their enforcement, did not suffice to protect against this manifest risk'.⁴⁵⁴

211 It is worth noting that the Committee's scope of remedies in individual complaints cases where a State party was found to have violated Article 3 CAT includes not only consular visits and monitoring of the person's situation in detention,⁴⁵⁵ but also a possible return of the person to the State party.⁴⁵⁶

212 The Committee's practice demonstrates that the value of diplomatic assurances must be weighed against the outcome of the risk assessment and assessed whether the assurances are sufficiently detailed and elaborate, whether their details have been disclosed or kept secret, and whether they include a post-return monitoring scheme.⁴⁵⁷

213 Some Council of Europe Member States supported the development of guidelines for diplomatic assurances,⁴⁵⁸ but the Committee of Ministers in March 2006 decided to stop this exercise after strong criticism by NGOs, the UN Special Rapporteur on Torture, the Council of Europe Commissioner for Human Rights, and the European Committee for the Prevention of Torture.⁴⁵⁹

As a result, both Governments share an interest in creating an

214 The question of the value of diplomatic assurances became particularly acute in the context of returns of terrorism suspects. In combating global terrorism after the events of 11 September 2001, the USA, European, and other States increasingly resorted to requesting States with a known record of torture to provide diplomatic assurances to the effect that suspected terrorists returned to these countries (for example Egypt, Syria, Jordan, Libya, Algeria) would not be subjected to torture upon return, a trend which the then High Commissioner for Human Rights qualified to have a ‘corrosive effect’ on the non-refoulement principle.⁴⁶⁰

215 Whilst the Committee does not receive individual complaints against the USA,⁴⁶¹ it expressed concern in the State reporting procedure about the practice of obtaining diplomatic assurances against torture in transfer proceedings of former Guantánamo detainees and remained ‘disturbed by reports from non-governmental sources which indicate that some former Guantanamo Bay detainees have experienced abuse during post-release treatment’.⁴⁶²

216 Despite the growing evidence (such as in the cases of Maher Arar and Ahmed Agiza as discussed above) about the non-reliability of diplomatic assurances in relation to torture, the British Government, in reaction to the bombings in London on 7 July 2005, concluded three Memorandums of Understanding with Jordan, Libya, and Lebanon, and later also with Ethiopia to facilitate the return of terrorism suspects to these countries. They included diplomatic assurances relating to torture and other ill-treatment as well as the instalment of a post-return monitoring body in charge of overseeing the implementation of the assurances.⁴⁶³ Although the return to Libya has stopped, the Committee in its Concluding Observations on the UK in 2013 still expressed concern about the country’s reliance on diplomatic assurances when deporting foreign terrorism suspects to countries with a track record of widespread torture:

The more widespread the practice of torture or other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment, the less likely the possibility of the real risk of such treatment being avoided by diplomatic assurances, however stringent any agreed follow-up procedure may be. Therefore, the Committee considers that diplomatic assurances are unreliable and ineffective and should not be used as an instrument to modify the determination of the Convention.⁴⁶⁴

217 In relation to the ECtHR, the Othman (Abu Qatada) v the UK case constitutes a defining moment in the Court's jurisprudence regarding the value of diplomatic assurances. Othman Abu Qatada, an Islamic cleric and national of Jordan, was granted asylum in the UK where he fled to after having been detained and tortured in Jordan. Abu Qatada was suspected of having been involved in a number of terrorist attacks, was wanted by several countries, and considered a security threat in the UK. His deportation to Jordan was carried out with the aim of trying him for offences for which he had already been convicted in absentia.⁴⁶⁵ Prior to Othman, the ECtHR in Saadi v UK had emphasized the importance of the practical implementation of the particular assurances.⁴⁶⁶ In Othman, the ECtHR noted that the CAT Committee diagnosed torture to be 'widespread and routine' in Jordan, but did not conclude therefrom that the general human rights situation precluded accepting diplomatic assurances in individual cases.⁴⁶⁷ This judgment therefore stands opposed to the standing of the CAT Committee which has consistently emphasized that States are not to request diplomatic assurances from countries which are found to harbour systematic and widespread torture. Also, the weight afforded to bilateral agreements in the argument of the ECtHR clearly undermines the weight of the international human rights framework. Ultimately, the ECtHR analysed the given diplomatic assurances in the Othman case in political rather than legal terms, and concluded that given the good relationship between the UK and Jordan, the good faith in which the assurances were concluded, and their approval of the highest levels of Government,⁴⁶⁸ compliance with those assurances was likely. This judgment stands apart from previous ones in which the ECtHR had ruled that diplomatic assurances provided no safeguard because of the systematic nature of torture in the countries concerned.⁴⁶⁹

218 In conclusion it can be stated that diplomatic assurances from States known for their practice of torture are unreliable and ineffective in the protection against torture and other forms of ill-treatment and should, therefore, not be resorted to by sending States, including in cases of suspected terrorists or persons considered a threat to national security.

3.7 Burden of Proof

219 According to Article 3(1) CAT an individual must not be expelled, returned, or extradited to another State where there are 'substantial grounds for believing' that there is a risk of torture. This standard of proof is 'an—interrelated—matter of credibility, plausibility and evidence'.⁴⁷⁰

220 On the initiative of the UK, the phrase 'substantial grounds for believing' was inserted to replace the phrase 'reasonable grounds to believe', as contained in the original Swedish draft and the IAPL draft.⁴⁷¹ The USSR draft of March 1979⁴⁷² as well as other proposals sought to introduce the concept of ‘substantial evidence’, but it was pointed out that, as the purpose of the provision was to afford the greatest possible protection against torture, the evidentiary requirement should not be too rigorous and should be kept to a minimum. It was further said that the burden of proof should not fall solely upon the person concerned.

221 The burden of proof is shared by the applicant and the State party. While the applicant must start with the substantiation of the risk and submit sufficient details and evidence in support of his or her account of events as much as possible in order to shift the burden of proof,⁴⁷³ the State party is responsible to respond.

3.7.1 Substantiation of the Risk by the Applicant

222 For a complaint to be declared admissible, according to General Comment No 4 (2017), the applicant is responsible for providing exhaustive arguments for his/her complaint of alleged violation of Article 3 ... in such a way that, from the first impression (prima facie) or from subsequent submissions, if necessary, the Committee finds it relevant for consideration under article 22 ... and fulfilling each of the requirements established under Rule 113 of the Committee’s rules of procedure.⁴⁷⁴

In relation to admissibility, the Committee normally does not provide much explanation why information is sufficient,⁴⁷⁵ stating only for instance that the applicant ‘provided sufficient information to permit it to consider the case on the merits’⁴⁷⁶ or that ‘the arguments before it raise substantive issues which should be dealt with on the merits and not on admissibility considerations alone’.⁴⁷⁷

223 On the merits, the burden of proof is upon the applicant to present a factual basis for his or her position sufficient to require a response from the State party. According to General Comment No 4 (2017), the applicant has to present an ‘arguable case—ie to submit circumstantiated arguments showing that the danger of being subjected to torture is foreseeable, present, personal and real’,⁴⁷⁸ eg by ‘present[ing] evidence in support of his or her account of events’.⁴⁷⁹ In the academic literature it was criticized that in some cases the Committee seemingly gave the applicant a more far-reaching responsibility to provide the necessary evidence (‘arguable case’) than was required in other cases.⁴⁸⁰ For reversal of burden of proof see below 3.7.2.

⁴⁷⁸ CAT/C/GC/4 (n 2) para 38. The Committee ‘consider[s] the risk of torture as foreseeable, personal, present and real when the existence of credible facts relating to the risk by itself ... would affect the rights of the complainant under the Convention in case of his/her deportation’: CAT/C/GC/4 (n 2) para 45.

⁴⁷⁹ See eg Mehdi Zare v Sweden, No 256/2004 (n 216) para 9.5; AH v Sweden, No 265/2005, UN Doc CAT/C/37/D/265/2005, 16 November 2006, para 11.6.

⁴⁸⁰ Wouters criticized that the Committee ‘seemingly plac[ed] the burden of proof solely on the individual’, since it considered that the applicant ‘has not proven his claim’, ‘even though he had also provided a detailed account of the facts and a medical certificate indicating symptoms consistent with those of victims of torture. See Wouters (n 107) 484–487, referring to SL v Sweden, No 150/1999, UN Doc CAT/C/26/D/150/1999, 11 May 2001, para 6.4 or FFZ v Denmark, No 180/2001 (n 368) para 12.

224 In its jurisprudence, the Committee has stipulated that ‘the burden is generally on the complainant to present an arguable case’⁴⁸¹ or that ‘it is normally for the complainant to present an arguable case’.⁴⁸² In its former General Comment No 1 (1998) as well as its jurisprudence, the Committee stated that ‘the risk of torture must be assessed on grounds that go beyond mere theory or suspicion’ but that the risk ‘does not have to meet the test of being highly probable’.⁴⁸³ General Comment No 4, which replaces General Comment No 1, does not contain this phrase anymore.

225 Poor human rights conditions per se are not sufficient to establish a personal risk. However, they ‘can alleviate the burden of proof considerably’.⁴⁸⁴

226 Even though the applicant must present an arguable case, this ‘does not exempt the State party from making substantial efforts to determine whether there are grounds for believing that the complainant would be in danger of being subjected to torture if returned’.⁴⁸⁵ Thus the State must sufficiently investigate whether there are substantial grounds for believing that a torture risk exists. In particular, even if the applicant does not provide sufficient documentary evidence to support his or her asylum application, the State party must not draw ‘an adverse credibility conclusion without adequately exploring a fundamental aspect’ of a claim (eg by not ordering a medical examination).⁴⁸⁶

3.7.1.1 Credibility and Plausibility of the Claim and Applicant

227 In the personal risk assessment information on the credibility of the applicant is to be taken into account. According to General Comment No 4 (2017) information on whether ‘there [is] any evidence as to the credibility of the complainant’ would be pertinent,

[b]earing in mind the status of physical and psychological fragility encountered by the majority of complainants such as asylum seekers, former detainees, victims of torture or sexual violence etc., which is conducive to some inconsistencies and/or lapses of memory in their submissions.⁴⁸⁷

It further mentions that information on whether the applicant ‘[has] demonstrated a general veracity of his/her claims’ is pertinent, ‘[t]aking into account some inconsistencies that may exist in the presentation of the facts’.⁴⁸⁸

228 In its case law, the Committee has specified that facts presented by the applicant relating to her or his individual situation must be sufficiently detailed,⁴⁸⁹ consistent, and accurate,⁴⁹⁰ as well as plausible in light of the general human rights situation. Another factor determining the credibility is the moment when facts and evidence are presented (as early as possible).⁴⁹¹

229 Facts presented should be sufficiently substantiated, reliable, and verifiable. It is not necessary that all facts invoked by the applicant must be proved⁴⁹² but the Committee must consider them ‘to be sufficiently substantiated and reliable’.⁴⁹³ This can be seen against the background that the Committee must ensure that the applicant’s security is not endangered⁴⁹⁴—demanding full proof would run counter this principle. In some cases, the Committee explicitly referred in this context to the difficult human rights situation in the receiving country.⁴⁹⁵ Therefore, some doubts regarding the veracity of the facts may remain. The applicant should provide as much evidence as possible and explanations for missing details and evidence.⁴⁹⁶ Once the applicant has provided ‘sufficient reliable information’ the burden of proof shifts to the State party.⁴⁹⁷

230 Contradictions and inaccuracies in the account or lies do not constitute an obstacle if they are not material, for example in light of the human rights situation in the receiving country,⁴⁹⁸ and/or do not raise doubts about the general credibility and the veracity of the applicant’s claims⁴⁹⁹ or if they are clarified by subsequent explanations.⁵⁰⁰ The Committee also explained that ‘the principle of strict accuracy does not necessarily apply when the inconsistencies are of a material nature’, in particular if ‘the presentation of facts by the author does not raise significant doubts as to the trustworthiness of the general veracity of his claims'.⁵⁰¹

231 A factor taken into account in the Committee's case law is whether the authorities of the State party, which challenge the credibility of the applicant and/or claim, have made sufficient efforts to shed light on the facts of the case and have thoroughly evaluated the claim.⁵⁰² The Committee further assesses whether the applicant has responded with 'a persuasive argument that would allow the Committee to call into question the State party's conclusions in this respect',⁵⁰³ in particular by arguing that the decision of the State party's authority was 'clearly arbitrary or amounted to a denial of justice'.⁵⁰⁴

232 In relation to contradictions and inconsistencies in the applicant's account, the Committee has stated several times in its jurisprudence that 'complete accuracy is seldom to be expected by victims of torture',⁵⁰⁵ in particular in cases where the applicant can provide evidence that he or she is suffering from post-traumatic stress disorder as a consequence of past torture or can produce a medical report consistent with the allegations of torture.⁵⁰⁶ The Committee has also noted that 'credibility should be assessed taking account of the vulnerable state of . . . mental health'.⁵⁰⁷ In this regard also General Comment No 4 (2017) clarifies:

Torture victims and other vulnerable persons frequently suffer from Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD) which can result in a broad range of symptoms, including involuntary avoidance and dissociation. These symptoms may affect the ability of the person to disclose all relevant details or to relay a consistent story throughout the proceedings. In order to ensure that victims of torture or other vulnerable persons are afforded an effective remedy, States parties should refrain from following a standardized credibility assessment process to determine the validity of a non-refoulement claim. As regards potential factual contradictions and inconsistencies in the author's allegations, the States parties should appreciate that complete accuracy can seldom be expected from victims of torture.⁵⁰⁸

233 As a rule, facts and evidence should be presented as early as possible, if possible when lodging an asylum application.⁵⁰⁹ If evidence or facts are presented at a later stage, plausible explanations for the delay should be given.⁵¹⁰ New testimony submitted at a very late stage in the proceedings is treated by the Committee with ‘utmost caution’.⁵¹¹ However, the Committee has already noted that submitting some claims or corroborating evidence at a later stage ‘is not uncommon for victims of torture’.⁵¹² Also here the primary concern of the Committee is the safety of the individual.⁵¹³ In particular, in cases of sexual abuse, the Committee accepted the revealing of facts at a late stage in the asylum procedure and the accompanying explanations.⁵¹⁴

3.7.1.2 Evidence in Support of the Claim

234 In order to show that substantial grounds for believing that the applicant would be in danger of being subjected to torture exist, evidence can be submitted. In particular evidence relating to the issues as mentioned in General Comment No 4 (2017), para 49, is of relevance, that is relating to past experiences of torture and other ill-treatment (medical, psychological, and other evidence),⁵¹⁵ relating to the credibility of the claim and the applicant⁵¹⁶ or relating to the general human rights situation in the receiving country.⁵¹⁷ Full proof that a risk exists is not required (see above, 3.7.1.1).

235 Any relevant document can be submitted—no limitations regarding the sources exist.⁵¹⁸ Neither are there any guidelines concerning the reliability of the sources.⁵¹⁹ General Comment No 4 stipulates that ‘[t]he Committee’s assessment will be primarily based on the information provided by or on behalf of the complainant and by the State party concerned’ but that the Committee ‘will also consult United Nations sources of information as well as any other sources that the Committee considers reliable’.⁵²⁰ However, the submission of forged documents may undermine the credibility of the claim.⁵²¹ The Committee has in its case law taken into account different forms of documentation as relevant evidence to support a claim, for example identity papers, evidence that the applicant is sought (or in danger of being sought) by the authorities of the receiving State (for example arrest warrants),⁵²² judgments of authorities of the receiving State,⁵²³ medical reports supporting alleged experiences of past torture or other forms of ill-treatment (see below, §§ 236f), or letters of support.⁵²⁴

of past torture or other ill-treatment.⁵²⁵ The lack of medical evidence can be of disadvantage to the applicant in the risk assessment.⁵²⁶ Such evidence should be objective and conclusive about the causal link between physical or mental injuries and past experiences of torture.⁵²⁷ Thus medical evidence should indicate whether injuries are consistent with alleged torture or other ill-treatment,⁵²⁸ for example forensic medical reports or psychiatric reports which confirm that it is likely that the applicant was subjected to torture or other ill-treatment in the past. Even if medical reports fail to specify when and where torture took place, they may provide grounds which go beyond mere theory or suspicion for believing that torture took place in the recent past.⁵²⁹ In some cases, however, it seems not clear whether the Committee has taken medical evidence submitted by the applicant into account.⁵³⁰

237 In some cases applicants argued that the State party had failed to carry out an independent medical assessment of the alleged torture or other ill-treatment. For the Committee it was of relevance whether the applicant had sufficient opportunity during the domestic proceedings to request such assessment.⁵³¹ Regarding the question whether domestic authorities are obliged to carry out a medical assessment, the Committee's jurisprudence seems not always clear: The Committee accepted in some cases that domestic authorities did not consider it necessary to order a medical examination if they had thoroughly assessed the claim as well as evidence and found it to lack credibility.⁵³² In other cases the Committee criticized when the State party's domestic proceedings found the claim not credible without ordering a medical examination if it concerned a fundamental aspect of the claim.⁵³³ The Committee was also critical of domestic authorities when they did not initiate further examinations if the applicant had already submitted 'unequivocal medical reports'.⁵³⁴ In this context, General Comment No 4 clearly stipulates that in the domestic proceedings an examination by a qualified medical doctor, including as requested by the complainant to prove the torture that he/she has suffered, should always be ensured, regardless of the authorities' assessment on the credibility of the allegation, so that the authorities deciding on a given case of deportation are able to complete the assessment of the risk of torture on the basis of the result of the medical and psychological examinations, without any reasonable doubt.⁵³⁵

The Committee also considered in its jurisprudence whether the applicant's request for a medical examination was formulated only at a very late stage,⁵³⁶ and whether a medical assessment is still useful after a long time has elapsed between the alleged torture and the request for medical examination.⁵³⁷ The Committee has criticized late submission of medical evidence if this was not accompanied by sound explanations.⁵³⁸

3.7.2 Shift of Burden of Proof to the State Party

238 While the applicant must submit sufficient details and collect and present evidence in support of his or her account of events as much as possible, the State party must present evidence and verify information submitted by the applicant. An active role for the State party follows from the wording of Article 3⁵³⁹ as well as the object and purpose of the Convention, in particular the preventive character of the refoulement prohibition.⁵⁴⁰ The Committee stressed in its jurisprudence that although it is for the complainant to establish a prima facie case for an asylum request, it does not exempt the State party from making substantial efforts to determine whether there are grounds for believing that the complainant would be in danger of being subjected to torture if returned.⁵⁴¹

239 If the applicant presents an arguable case with verifiable information, the burden of proof shifts to the State party.⁵⁴² The latter must make sufficient efforts to determine whether there are substantial grounds for believing that the applicant would be in danger of being subjected to torture.⁵⁴³ It is not necessary that all the facts invoked by the applicant are proved. It is enough that the Committee should consider them to be sufficiently substantiated and reliable.⁵⁴⁴ In this context, General Comment No 4 stipulates that the burden of proof is upon the author of the communication who has to present an arguable case—ie to submit circumstantiated arguments showing that the danger of being subjected to torture is foreseeable, present, personal and real. However, when the complainant is in a situation where he/she cannot elaborate on his/her case, for instance, when the complainant has demonstrated that he/she has no possibility of obtaining documentation relating to his/her allegation of torture or is deprived of his/her liberty, the burden of proof is reversed and it is up to the State party concerned to investigate the allegations and verify the information on which the communication is based.⁵⁴⁵

240 In general, where the human rights situation in a State is poor and the personal characteristics of the applicant suggest that he or she might be more likely to suffer torture, the risk of being subjected to torture is assumed by the Committee and the onus shifts to the State party.⁵⁴⁶

3.7.3 Procedure by Domestic Authorities

241 According to Article 3(2), in order determine whether substantial grounds exist, the ‘competent authorities shall take into account all relevant considerations ...’. The phrase ‘competent authorities’ was inserted in the text of Article 3(2) in 1984 on the initiative of the delegation of the UK to improve earlier drafts and make clear who must take relevant considerations into account.⁵⁴⁷ ‘Competent authorities’ refers to those administrative or judicial bodies of the State party that take decisions about the expulsion, extradition, return, or deportation of a person to another State, and the authorities involved in seeking and monitoring diplomatic assurances. All these bodies, from the administrative decision of first instance rendered by an asylum, immigration, or police authority up to the final administrative or judicial decision of authorizing the date and means of transfer of a person, must take all relevant considerations into account when assessing the possible risk of torture in the receiving State. Due to the serious consequences of such an assessment, it should preferably be taken by a judicial body, or at least administrative decisions should be subject to full judicial review.

242 The Committee has—given its function as ‘a monitoring body created by the States parties themselves with declaratory powers only’—repeatedly emphasized in individual complaints cases and in its General Comment No 4 that it gives ‘considerable weight’ to the ‘findings of fact made by organs of the State party concerned’.⁵⁴⁸ This does not apply when such findings are ‘arbitrary or otherwise unreasonable’⁵⁴⁹ or the evaluation of the State party amounts to a ‘denial of justice’.⁵⁵⁰ After the burden of proof has shifted to the State party, it is the responsibility of its domestic authorities to gather relevant information and evidence and to carry out a proper risk assessment while guaranteeing procedural safeguards. After all, the authorities of the host State are often in a better position to collect evidence and to take all information available into account than a person who just escaped torture in his or her home country. If such risk assessment is made in a well-informed, transparent and reasonable manner, the Committee usually accepts such findings.

243 General Comment No 4 contains detailed information on the required procedure by domestic authorities. The State party is responsible ‘at the national level, to assess, through administrative and/or judicial procedures, whether there are substantial grounds for believing’ that the applicant ‘faces a foreseeable, present, personal and real risk of being subjected to torture’ upon return.⁵⁵¹ In this procedure, the State party should provide ‘fundamental guarantees and safeguards’, in particular ‘if the person is deprived of his/her liberty’ or ‘in a particularly vulnerable situation’.⁵⁵² Such guarantees and safeguards should include linguistic, legal, medical, social and, when necessary, financial assistance as well as the right to a recourse against a decision of deportation within a reasonable timeframe for a person in a precarious and stressful situation and with the suspensive effect of the enforcement of the deportation order.⁵⁵³

The General Comment further stipulates that ‘an examination by a qualified medical doctor, including as requested by the complainant to prove the torture that he/she has suffered, should always be ensured, regardless of the authorities’ assessment on the credibility of the allegation’.⁵⁵⁴ General Comment No 4 also stipulates that ‘[e]ach case should be individually, impartially and independently examined by the State party through competent administrative and/or judicial authorities, in conformity with essential procedural safeguards’.⁵⁵⁵

244 The Committee has also made clear that—while giving ‘considerable weight’ to findings of fact made by organs of States parties—it ‘is not bound’ by them. It stresses that it ‘will make a free assessment of the information available ... taking into account all the circumstances relevant to each case’.⁵⁵⁶ The Committee stressed its own powers of free assessment of the facts in its jurisprudence in particular in view of tightening of asylum and immigration laws, speeding up procedures, and often providing for only superficial taking of evidence by domestic authorities, but also in the context of the global fight against terrorism.⁵⁵⁷

3.7.4 Procedure by the Committee

245 In order to ensure the overarching principle of not endangering the security of the applicant, the Committee repeatedly stressed that ‘it is not necessary that all the facts invoked by the author should be proved; it is sufficient that the Committee should consider them to be sufficiently substantiated and reliable’.⁵⁵⁸ In this context, the General Comment No 4 stipulates that ‘[t]he principle of the benefit of the doubt, as a preventive measure against irreparable harm, will also be taken into account by the Committee in adopting decisions on individual communications, where the principle is relevant’.⁵⁵⁹

246 For determining whether a State party actually violates Article 3, the Committee must carry out its own risk assessment on the basis of all information made available by both parties as well as other information relating to the general situation in the country where the applicant is in danger of being returned or actually has already been returned.

⁵⁵⁹ CAT/C/GC/4 (n 2) para 51.

The Committee repeatedly has stressed its own powers of free assessment of the facts (see above, § 244).

247 First the Committee considers whether the applicant has established an arguable case and substantiated the real, present, and personal risk of being subjected to torture on grounds that go beyond mere theory or suspicion. Secondly, if such an arguable case has been presented by the applicant, it considers whether the authorities of the State party have carried out a proper investigation of the facts and a respective risk assessment,⁵⁶⁰ taking into account both the objective human rights situation in the country concerned and the subjective reasons of the applicant to fear torture upon return.⁵⁶¹ Finally, the Committee must conduct its own risk assessment in relation to the time when the domestic authorities decided to expel, extradite, or return the applicant. In order to determine what the State party knew or should have known at the time of the relevant decision, the Committee also takes into account facts and events that occurred after this decision, including information from the applicant after his or her forcible removal.⁵⁶²

248 In its own risk assessment, the Committee gives most weight to allegations by the applicant that are not disputed by the State party. Where the State party disputes certain claims of the applicant, this must be backed up by sound explanations. The more efforts the domestic authorities have made to establish the relevant evidence and to take all available information fully into account, the more importance the Committee attaches to the findings and risk assessment of domestic authorities.⁵⁶³ It was not enough, for example, for the State party to argue that the claims of the applicant had been insufficient as to warrant a medical examination without supplying the Committee with reasons as to why this had been the case.⁵⁶⁴

249 The Committee also takes other objective information into account in determining whether or not the State party has violated Article 3.⁵⁶⁵ As evidence relating to the situation in the country of origin, the Committee uses in its jurisprudence different sources,⁵⁶⁶ in particular information from the UN human rights protection system, such as mechanisms established under the Convention against Torture, in particular its own Concluding Observations⁵⁶⁷ or information from its inquiry mechanism under Article 20 CAT;⁵⁶⁸ information from other UN treaty bodies such as the HRC,⁵⁶⁹ information from mandate holders of the special procedures of the Human Rights Council,⁵⁷⁰ or information provided by UNHCR.⁵⁷¹ It sometimes also refers to information from regional human rights systems, such as reports of the CPT, but also to documents from non-governmental organizations.⁵⁷² The Committee sometimes only states that it is aware of the human rights situation in the receiving State without specifying its sources.⁵⁷³

250 The objective and subjective test (see above, 3.6.2.1) leads to the practice that the more serious the general human rights situation in the receiving State concerned appears, the more the burden of proof shifts to the State party (see above, 3.7.2). However, if the general situation appears not that poor, then the onus remains on the applicant to prove why he or she is personally in danger of being subjected to torture upon return. This leads to the significance of Article 3(2) CAT for the risk assessment of both the State party and the Committee.

3.8 Interim Measures under Article 3 CAT

251 In the majority of cases concerning Article 3, States have respected the interim measures requested by the Committee. When States parties return the person disregarding the Committee's interim measures, the subsequent examination of the individual case by the Committee usually results in a finding of a violation of Articles 3 and 22.⁵⁷⁴ Fewer are the cases where a violation of Article 22 CAT did not entail also a violation of Article 3 CAT.⁵⁷⁵ In the case Elif Petit v Azerbaijan, where the State party had disregarded the imposed interim measures, expelled the applicant, thereby rendering the Committee's final decision on the merits 'futile and devoid of object',⁵⁷⁶ the violation of Article 22 CAT had a bearing on the findings regarding Article 3 CAT:

In these circumstances, and given that the State party had extradited the complainant notwithstanding that it had initially agreed to comply with the Committee's request for interim measures, the Committee considers that the manner in which the State party handled the complainant's case amounts to a breach of her rights under article 3 of the Convention.⁵⁷⁷

1 The object and purpose of the Convention is to make the struggle against torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment more effective by establishing State obligations to prevent torture and other forms of ill-treatment, and to assist victims, as well as to punish the perpetrators of torture. Article 4 is the central norm in relation to the objective of fighting impunity as one of the root causes of the widespread practice of torture worldwide. It requires States parties to make torture, but not other forms of ill-treatment, an offence under their domestic criminal laws with appropriate penalties taking into account the grave nature of the crime of torture. The term ‘torture’ must be interpreted in accordance with the definition in Article 1, which means that not only the act of torture but also the attempt, instigation, incitement, superior order and instruction, consent and acquiescence, concealment, and other forms of complicity and participation, must be criminalized. Although not a strict legal requirement, it is advisable that States parties fully incorporate the definition of Article 1, without the sentence on ‘lawful sanctions’, into their domestic criminal code.

2 The fact-finding missions of the UN Special Rapporteur on Torture, Manfred Nowak, have shown that perpetrators ‘if held accountable at all, were predominantly punished with disciplinary sanctions and light or suspended prison sentences. The forms of discipline do not normally go beyond demotion, delayed promotion or pay freeze’.¹ According to the practice of the CAT Committee in the State reporting procedure, only a prison sentence of at least a few years can be considered as an appropriate penalty which takes the grave nature of torture into account. Victims of torture can also invoke Article 4 in the individual complaints procedure under Article 22. In a landmark decision against Spain, the CAT Committee ruled that pardoning civil guards, who had been found guilty of torture by an independent court, violated the victim’s rights under Article 4(2).²

7 Commenting on Article 7 of the original draft version of the Swedish text, Spain observed that, in regard ‘acts of participation’, reference should be made not only to accomplices but also to accessories after the fact. Additionally, the word ‘incitación’ (incitement) could be replaced by the term used in Article 3 of the Spanish Criminal Code, namely ‘proposición o provocación’ (proposal or provocation). In paragraph 2 of the same article, the expression ‘penas severas’ should be replaced by the more technical term ‘penas graves’.

8 France suggested that, in paragraph 1, the word ‘délits’ (offence) should be replaced by the word ‘infractions’ (infraction) and the word ‘incitation’ (incitement) should be replaced by ‘provocation’ (provocation). France also suggested that paragraph 2 could be made into a separate article and, as far as the concept of ‘cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment’ is maintained in the Convention, such treatment or punishment should also be considered as an offence punishable by severe penalties.⁷

9 In written comments, the UK Government suggested that the words ‘as defined in Article 1’ be deleted, reasoning that it was unnecessary to refer to the definition already given in Article 1 which applies throughout the draft. The UK delegation also suggested that paragraph 2 be deleted and replaced with ‘Each State Party shall make these crimes punishable by appropriate penalties which take into account their grave nature’. The United Kingdom pointed to a precedent for this formula in Article 2(2) of the 1973 New York Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of Crimes against Internationally Protected Persons, including Diplomatic Agents.⁸ These points were taken into account in the revised Swedish draft which contains the wording as it appears in the final text of the Convention.

10 As regards the concepts of ‘complicity or participation in torture’ in Article 4(1) of the revised Swedish draft, doubts were expressed whether, in the legislation of all countries, these terms would cover those persons who were accessories to the crime of torture after it had occurred or who had in some way concealed acts of torture. One representative proposed the addition of the word ‘encubrimiento’ (concealment) in Spanish. Some speakers felt that in the legal systems of their countries the term ‘complicity’ already covered the concept of ‘concealment’.

11 The Working Group agreed to include, in brackets, an explanatory footnote for Article 4(1) on this matter,⁹ and adopted by consensus the following version of Article 4:

- (1) Each State Party shall ensure that all acts of torture are offenses under its criminal law. The same shall apply to an attempt to commit torture and to an act by any person which constitutes complicity or participation in torture.
- (2) Each State Party shall make these offenses punishable by appropriate penalties which take into account their grave nature.

Subsequently, one delegate reserved his position on Article 4 because of his concern that the word ‘complicity’ was not broad enough to cover the notion of ‘accessory after the fact’ under his country’s domestic law.¹⁰

12 Bulgaria expressed its support for the provisions in Article 4.¹¹

13 At the fifty-sixth meeting, the USSR unsuccessfully introduced amendments¹² to the draft resolution regarding Article 4(1) which suggested that the words ‘irrespective of the reason, purposes and motives for which they were committed’ be added after ‘all acts of torture’.¹³

3. Issues of Interpretation

3.1 Applicability of Article 4 to Cruel, Inhuman and Degrading Treatment

14 During the drafting of the Convention, some States parties maintained that severe penalties in domestic law should not only criminalize torture but also other forms of ill-treatment.¹⁴ However, the majority of States parties were of the opinion that a State obligation to criminalize such behaviour should only apply to torture in the narrow sense.¹⁵

15 In contrast, in its General Comment No 2, the CAT Committee states that ‘Articles 3 to 15 are likewise obligatory as applied to both torture and ill-treatment’.¹⁶ In line with this, the CAT Committee extended in some concluding observations the scope of Article 4, concluding that provisions that make the imposition of other forms of ill-treatment punishable must also be included in national criminal laws.¹⁷ Following this interpretation of Article 4 would result in a significantly broader obligation of the States parties.

16 Although the CAT Committee in the context of the State reporting procedure occasionally criticized States parties for not including other forms of ill-treatment in their criminal laws, this has been recorded only on a limited number of occasions.¹⁸ In fact, both the formulation of Article 4(1) and the travaux préparatoires indicate that the obligation to criminalize does not apply to other forms of ill-treatment.¹⁹ One argument being the difficulty to find a definition of cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment or punishment, also because the Convention does not provide for a definition.²⁰

17 Further, the State obligations under Article 16 require States parties to ‘prevent’ other forms of ill-treatment not amounting to torture. In that regard, Articles 4 to 9—being mainly of repressive nature—stand separate from the key preventive Articles 10 to 13. Notwithstanding the fact that the use of criminal law, of course, also has a preventive effect,²¹ the main objective of Article 4 remains primarily to criminalize acts of torture and prosecute perpetrators. Accordingly, States parties are not obliged to make the offence of cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment a crime in domestic law. Thus, no further State obligations evoke from Article 4 than to criminalize torture. This does not exclude that general customary international law or other (regional) treaties might require States parties to criminalize other forms of ill-treatment as well.²²

²² Rodley and Pollard (n 19) 118; the inclusion of the obligation to criminalize also other forms of ill-treatment is not without precedence on the international level: thus, article 7 ICCPR requires States to penalize not only torture but also equally other forms of ill-treatment: UN Human Rights Committee (HRC), CCPR General Comment No 20: Article 7 (Prohibition of Torture, or Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment), 10 March 1992, para 13; also, while the ECHR, unlike the UNCAT, does not explicitly include an obligation to criminalize torture, this obligation arises from the other obligations as the duty to protect against torture and other forms of ill-treatment as well as to investigate cases where any form ill-treatment may have occurred. As, also the ECtHR finds violations of Article 3 ECHR without distinguishing between torture and other forms of ill-treatment, an obligation should be seen in enacting legislation covering not only torture but also other forms of ill-treatment: Association for the Prevention of Torture (APT) and the Center for Justice and International Law (CEJIL), Torture in International Law: A Guide to Jurisprudence (APT and CEJIL 2008) 68 ff; more explicitly Article 6 IACPPT states that ‘[t]he States Parties likewise shall take effective measures to prevent and punish other cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment within their jurisdiction’. Similarly, the African Commission has reaffirmed the States’ obligation to ‘prosecute and punish private actors who commit abuses’, and has thereby created the obligation to criminalize equally torture and other forms of ill-treatment: APT and CEJIL, Torture in International Law (n 22) 133.

3.2 Criminalized Acts under Article 4

3.2.1 Meaning of ‘all acts of torture’

18 The obligation of States parties to criminalize torture is based on Article 7 of the 1975 Declaration, which was reproduced literally in Article 7(1) of the original Swedish draft.²³ On the initiative of the UK delegation, the words ‘as defined in Article 1’ were deleted from Article 4 (1), since it was clear that the definition of torture in Article 1 applied throughout the Convention. In other words, at least—all acts of torture as defined in Article 1 has to be criminalized under the Convention.²⁴

19 Further, certain omissions may also be classified as torture. Although there is no explicit reference in the travaux préparatoires and the Convention refers to the term ‘acts’, it would contradict the Convention’s overall aim to exclude all omissions amid the presence of all other elements that constitute torture. It would not be consistent to exclude omissions, which can also amount to severe pain or suffering of the victim. Thus, arguably at least some omissions must fall within the scope of Article 1 and must be criminalized according to Article 4.²⁵ Respectively, the CAT Committee states in its General Comment No 3 that the Convention does not only require criminalizing an act but also an omission ‘as long as it is deliberately meant for inflicting the victim with severe mental or physical suffering’.²⁶

3.2.2 Meaning of ‘attempt, complicity and participation’

20 According to the text of the Convention, for establishing criminal responsibility under Article 4, an act of torture does not need to be committed, because an attempt to commit torture should also be criminalized.²⁷ For example, if law enforcement officers refuse to follow a respective order by a superior and do not apply torture methods, the superior officer is nevertheless guilty of an attempt to commit torture and should be punished accordingly.²⁸

21 The second sentence of Article 4(1) was only slightly amended from the Original Swedish draft by deleting the word ‘incitement’ which still seems to be covered by the broader terms ‘complicity or participation’. Further, the Working Group wished to ensure, by adding a footnote to its draft of Article 4(1), that the term ‘complicity’ also includes the concept of ‘concealment’ after torture has been committed.²⁹ Although the Convention does not expressly link the wording of Article 1 with the terms ‘complicity’ or ‘participation’ in Article 4, Article 4(1) is closely related to the definition of torture

in Article 1(1), which includes instigation, consent and acquiescence. In other words, as the term ‘all acts of torture’ must be read in accordance with the definition in Article 1 throughout the Convention, the terms ‘complicity or participation’ in Article 4 must be interpreted to include incitement, instigation, superior orders or instructions, (tacit) consent,³⁰ acquiescence and concealment.³¹ The CAT Committee in the State reporting procedure also confirmed this broad interpretation.³²

22 Thus, the Convention obliges States parties not only to criminalize the direct perpetrator of torture—committed or attempted—but also those who are directly or indirectly involved. Accordingly, for example, individuals involved in the chain of commands by inciting, instigating, instructing, acquiescing, participating or being complicit in a way corresponding with Article 1 either before, during, or after the act of torture are equally criminally liable under Article 4. Thus, officials who order or instruct others to carry out torture must be made criminally responsible by national law.³³ Superior officials are also guilty of complicity (acquiescence) in torture if they knew or should have known that torture is practised by personnel under their command and failed to act to prevent or stop it.³⁴ Any involvement of doctors, even if only to ensure that the victim does not die or suffer physical injuries, is punishable as a form of participation.³⁵

23 Additionally, States parties are obliged to criminalize acts relating to cover-up or concealment, at the very least, positive acts taken with the intention of concealing an act of torture or leaving it unpunished.³⁶ According to the CAT Committee, even those who knowingly fail to report acts of torture can be held criminally culpable.³⁷ Therefore, certain intentional omissions aimed at concealing torture may also be covered by ‘complicity or participation’.³⁸

3.3 Criminalization of Torture under National Law

3.3.1 Inclusion of a Separate Offence

24 Article 4(1) requires every State party to ‘ensure that all acts of torture are offenses under its criminal law’. According to Burgers and Danelius, Article 4 does not require ‘that there must be a separate offence corresponding to torture under [A]rticle 1 of the Convention’.³⁹ Burgers and Danelius were of the opinion that each State party was free to decide whether to deal with torture as a separate offence or to include acts of torture in one or more wider categories of offences. However, they insisted that ‘whatever solution is adopted, the criminal law must cover all cases falling within the definition in [A]rticle 1 of the Convention’.⁴⁰ This interpretation has given rise to much confusion, and many States parties argued that torture was in any way included in their traditional offences, such as ill-treatment or infliction of bodily harm⁴¹ but also amongst others, such as assault,⁴² rape,⁴³ arbitrary acts,⁴⁴ or the abuse of power and excess of authority or official power.⁴⁵

25 However, the inclusion of a separate offence eases the adherence with States parties' further obligations under the Convention, for example, to give effect to the specific jurisdiction under Articles 5 and 7.⁴⁶ Otherwise, States parties are inevitably confronted with the problem of the legal classification of a crime over which they need to establish jurisdiction,⁴⁷ and on the grounds of which they can institute prosecutions of persons who have perpetrated torture elsewhere.⁴⁸ Moreover, although acts that could be characterized as torture are punishable under various articles of the national Criminal Code, the absence of a single definition of the crime of torture as a separate criminal offence may cause a legal vacuum, possibly leaving some acts amounting to torture uncovered and subsequently unpunished.⁴⁹

26 Over time, the CAT Committee made clear in its concluding observations that Article 4 required the inclusion of torture as an offence in accordance with the definition in Article 1.⁵⁰ Furthermore, the CAT Committee has also recommended that the crime of torture should constitute a separate offence in the domestic legislation and not just an aggravating circumstance for the determination of a sentence.⁵¹ It reiterated that by a separate definition and a separate offence of torture in accordance with the Convention and distinguishing it clearly from other crimes, 'States parties would directly advance the Convention's overarching aim of preventing and punishing torture'.⁵² Following General Comment 2, '[n]aming and defining this crime will promote the Convention's aim, inter alia, by alerting everyone, including perpetrators, victims, and the public, to the special gravity of the crime of torture'.⁵³

27 Further, for Article 4 to have its full effect, the CAT Committee considers that specific measures must still be taken at the national level, even if a State allows for the direct effect of provisions of international law ('monist systems').⁵⁴ As the Convention in the context of Article 4 is not considered as self-executing,⁵⁵ the direct applicability of the Convention in a State party alone is not sufficient to ensure the obligations under Article 4. Accordingly, the offence of torture as defined in the Convention must be linked to a national provision, which imposes an appropriate punishment.

28 Besides, the CAT Committee noted in its conclusions that if the State party's domestic law itself does not explicitly reflect this prohibition, nor does it impose criminal sanctions the requirements under Article 4 are not met even if other (treaty) obligations expressly prohibit torture and other forms of ill-treatment. The CAT Committee considered that express incorporation in the State party's domestic law of the crime of torture is necessary to 'signify the cardinal importance of this prohibition' and ensure compliance with the obligations under the Convention.⁵⁶ The CAT Committee has also emphasized that a very general prohibition of torture—be it in the Constitution or any other particular national law, without specifically naming and criminalizing the offence of torture—is not corresponding to Article 4.⁵⁷ In addition, the sole inclusion of relevant articles of other international treaties into national legislation may not comply with the requirements of Article 4(1) if it does not adequately criminalize torture in general criminal law according to Article 1.⁵⁸

29 States parties should further ensure the criminalization of torture, in respect to cover their entire territory. In this regard, the CAT Committee expressed concerns relating to the lack of congruity between the offence of torture in domestic law and the requirements under Article 4.⁵⁹

3.3.2 Inclusion of a Definition of Torture

30 States parties must ensure that all forms of torture as defined under Article 1 are punishable offences under national law.⁶⁰ Given this connection between Articles 1 and 4, it is difficult to separate the discussions on the inclusion of the offence of torture in national criminal law from the debate of including a definition of torture in national legislation. For this reason, many of the CAT Committee's concluding observations and comments relevant to Article 1 apply similarly to the obligations under Article 4. Article 4 does not explicitly require that the definition of torture in Article 1 is reproduced verbatim in national criminal law. Rather, States parties must make all forms of torture punishable in national legislation.⁶¹ Therefore, the definition must cover at a minimum—but can be broader as well—all acts of torture covered in Article 1.⁶²

31 However, practice shows that it is difficult, if not impossible, to cover all the different aspects included in the definition of torture under Article 1 without explicitly incorporating a proper definition in national criminal code.⁶³ The CAT Committee highlighted that the lack of a definition of torture in national criminal code could lead to confusion and adversely affect the compliance by the States parties with their obligations to prevent and prohibit torture under the Convention.⁶⁴ Also because ‘serious discrepancies between the [C]onvention’s definition and that incorporated into domestic law create actual or potential loopholes for impunity’.⁶⁵ While the inclusion of the definition in Article 1 would enhance the clarity and predictability in the criminal law,⁶⁶ a partial inclusion or incompleteness of the definition of torture and its criminalization may thus result in impunity for acts of torture. Moreover, a lack of codification or a not proper definition of the crime of torture in national criminal law benefits too lenient penalties.⁶⁷ Hence, according to the CAT Committee, criminal laws do not comply with Article 1 if they overlook or partially restrict the definition of torture. Thus far, the CAT Committee has criticized States parties, on the one hand, for a non-adequate inclusion of the purpose or reason element of the crime.⁶⁸ On the other, for a non-adequate inclusion of the scope of application—either due to the limited scope of⁶⁹ or delineation between⁷⁰ potential perpetrators or the exclusion of some conducts,⁷¹ modalities of involvement in the crime,⁷² and/or the stage of accomplishing the crime of torture⁷³ (attempt).⁷⁴ After initial hesitation, the CAT Committee has increasingly urged States parties to include an explicit definition of torture in their national criminal legislation that is in 'strict conformity' with the Convention.⁷⁵

32 In light of the above, full incorporation of a definition of torture is advisable in order to avoid difficult problems of interpretation and implementation. This conclusion does not apply to the 'lawful sanctions' clause in the last sentence of Article 1(1).

1979.⁷⁹ In fact, there is no significant difference between ‘severe penalties’ and ‘appropriate penalties which take into account [the] grave nature’ of the offences punishable under Article 4.

34 Apart from literal interpretation of Article 4(2), neither the provisions of the Convention nor the jurisprudence of the CAT Committee defines a specific penalty and type or extent of sentence appropriate to and commensurate with the grave nature of the crime of torture. In the reporting procedure, the CAT Committee also did not arrive at a clear determination of what would constitute an appropriate punishment.⁸⁰ The provision of Article 4(2) makes clear that torture is one of the most severe human rights violations that requires a punishment severe enough to have a deterrent effect.⁸¹ This means that torture should not be a misdemeanour,⁸² but a crime similar to the ‘most serious offenses under the domestic legal system’.⁸³ This is confirmed by the practice of the CAT Committee that held that torture should also receive the heaviest punishment.⁸⁴

35 In this regard, after a careful examination of the CAT Committee’s concluding observations and the opinions of individual members, Ingelse concluded that a ‘custodial sentence of between six and twenty years’ would best correspond to the CAT Committee’s interpretation of the requirements of Article 4(2).⁸⁵ Since then, there have been numerous concluding observations in line with this conclusion without further defining the ‘appropriate penalties’ that take into account the grave nature of the act. Thus, contradicting the State obligations under Article 4(2) are fines,⁸⁶ conditional sentences or probation⁸⁷ as well as penalties that do not take into account the grave nature of the crime of torture.⁸⁸ In turn, from a human rights perspective life imprisonment, corporal or capital punishment also do not constitute an appropriate penalty.

36 Moreover, a very broad margin of discretion on the penalty for the crime of torture is not in accordance with Article 4(2), even if the maximum penalty corresponds to the standards set forth by the practice of the CAT Committee. The CAT Committee has stated that a penalty in the Criminal Code of the State Party of one to ten years' imprisonment for the basic crime of torture allowing the judge to impose a minimum sentence of one year is insufficient.⁸⁹ In other words, the sentence for the crime of torture must also correspond at the minimum penalty provided by law to the requirements in Article 4(2).⁹⁰

37 Further, it has to be stated that the consequences of torture should not be decisive for the sentence. The intention to torture itself is the injustice that must be convicted. Additional aggravating circumstances as for example the permanent disability or death of a victim should not influence the severity of the sentence, because the intention of torturing also holds the possibility of lasting physical and mental effects and cannot be excluded based on the very nature of the act of torture. Subsequently, the appropriate sentence has to target the injustice element of torture itself adequately.⁹¹

3.5 Exclusion of any Immunity, Justification, and Excuse

38 The prohibition of torture is an absolute and non-derogable right. Thus, according to Article 2 neither exceptional circumstances, such as state of war, internal political emergency or any other public emergency or order from a superior officer or public authority may be invoked as a justification of torture.⁹² Hence, the inclusion of a definition of the crime of torture with corresponding penalties in accordance with Article 4 in itself is not sufficient to effectively prevent and punish the acts corresponding to Article 1. It further requires the absence of limitations or defences such as 'necessity' or superior orders in law and practice.

39 The Convention does not permit any exceptions from the prohibition or the criminalization of the crime of torture due to a defence of immunity, justifications, or excuses.⁹³ Nevertheless, the tendency of granting amnesty for or pardoning torturers has been identified in numerous cases.⁹⁴ As the CAT Committee reiterated in different occasions, such a practice not only violates the absolute and inexcusable character of torture, but it also undermines the level of culpability and the degree of punishment that the grave nature of the crime necessitates imposing. Accordingly, any national law that grants amnesty, immunity, or pardon for perpetrators of torture—be it on traditional, religious, or other grounds—would undoubtedly violate the State's obligation under Article 4 and the absolute prohibition doctrine as stated in Article 2.⁹⁵

40 The aim of the Convention to punish perpetrators of torture together with the absolute nature of the prohibition of torture implies that granting immunities and amnesties,⁹⁶ for example to police, prosecutors, or military officials,⁹⁷ contradicts the obligations under Article 4.⁹⁸ Therefore, immunity should not hinder the investigation of alleged acts of torture and States parties should ensure that all persons can be held criminally liable for these acts. In addition, as Burns has strongly emphasized, general amnesties ‘by their very nature’ violate Article 4.⁹⁹ In this sense, States parties must ensure that amnesty laws exclude the offence of torture.¹⁰⁰

41 By similar reasoning as for immunity and amnesty, the pardonning of perpetrators of torture precludes or indicates the breach of obligations under Article 4(2). In the landmark case of Guridi v Spain, the CAT Committee reiterated the importance of punishing perpetrators of acts of torture with penalties in accordance with the nature and gravity of the offence. It considered that ‘in the circumstances of the present case, the imposition of lighter penalties and the granting of pardons to the civil guards are incompatible with the duty to impose appropriate punishment’.¹⁰¹

42 Further, Article 2(3) leaves no open question in relation to the justification of torture due to superior orders and unequivocally prohibits superior orders as a defence for criminal responsibility. Hence, the State practice to provide amnesty or immunity to officials or military personnel under ‘due obedience’ laws does not comply with Article 4.¹⁰² During the drafting process, the proposal to include the qualification to consider superior orders a ground for mitigation of punishment—if justifiable—was rejected. However, since then, it has been argued that a reduced sentence due to a superior order cannot be excluded.¹⁰³ This approach is arguable only while recognizing that mitigation can exclusively be applied if the perpetrator of torture has already been found guilty.¹⁰⁴ Even then, the mitigation cannot contravene the obligations under Article 4(2) and thus, the penalties must still reflect the grave nature of the crime committed. Otherwise, the requirement of appropriate penalties, which take into account the grave nature of the crimes committed, are not met. Thus, the obedience to superior orders cannot constitute a justification or an excuse and the impact of mitigating circumstance on the sentence has to be limited in accordance with Article 4(2).¹⁰⁵

43 In conclusion, amnesties, immunities, pardons, and other justifications or excuses are violating the obligations under Article 4 even where it has been granted to resolve armed conflicts or to engage in transitions. The same goes for state of emergency amid the amount of threat.¹⁰⁶ In accordance, the CAT Committee has recommended the abandonment of laws and practices that hinder the investigation and if appropriate the punishment of perpetrators of torture. All public officials and persons acting in an official capacity who engage in conducts that constitute torture must be charged accordingly.¹⁰⁷

3.6 Statute of Limitations

44 A statute of limitation by domestic law prevents the practical realization of the absolute prohibition of torture, the proper investigation, prosecution, and punishment of this non-derogable prohibition and ultimately results in impunity for the perpetrators.¹⁰⁸ While Rodley and Pollard do not entirely exclude the possibility for a statute of limitations if such a period at least reflects the exceptional seriousness of the crime and ranks amongst the longest foreseen by national law, the CAT Committee has insisted in numerous cases that no acts amounting to torture should be subject to any statute of limitations.¹⁰⁹ In consideration of its effects, a statute of limitations on a crime of torture would hinder the overall aim of the Convention.¹¹⁰ Accordingly, no time bar should deter the application of criminal law to all acts of torture.¹¹¹

45 Further, the exclusion of the statute of limitation only to cases where torture becomes an integral element of a crime of humanity¹¹² or only when it is committed against specific groups (eg, against persons protected under international humanitarian law)¹¹³ does not comply with the Convention. Moreover, a statute of limitations for specific aspects of acts of torture corresponding to Article 1, including attempts to commit torture or an act committed by any person, which constitutes complicity or participation in torture likewise contradict Article 4. This means that the rule on the statute of limitation has to be excluded for all acts of torture. The application of a statute of limitations is at complete odds with the obligations under Article 4. This is true, regardless of the longer or shorter period fixed by the law as a statute of limitation.¹¹⁴

3.7 Can a Violation of Article 4 be Invoked in the Individual Complaint Procedure?

46 The Convention contains various State obligations aimed at preventing torture and punishing the perpetrators of torture. From the text of these provisions, it is not always clear whether they also provide subjective rights, which victims of torture can invoke in an individual complaints procedure. This question is particularly difficult to answer in relation to the obligation of States parties to punish perpetrators, because human rights law, in principle, does not recognize a subjective right of victims to have perpetrators of human rights violations punished by criminal law.¹¹⁵

47 Before the Convention entered into force, the CAT Committee, in OR et al v Argentina (also known as the ‘Punto Final’ cases), noted that the enactment of the ‘Punto Final’ and Due Obedience Acts only shortly before the entry into force of the Convention was ‘incompatible with the spirit and purpose of the Convention’. It held in an obiter dictum that Argentina was ‘morally bound to provide a remedy to victims of torture and to their dependants’, which would be hindered by the enactment of the legislation.¹¹⁶ In this context, it is also worth noting the earlier decision of the Human Rights Committee (HRC) in the case of Hugo Rodriguez v Uruguay. The case concerns a victim of torture under the former military regime, who submitted a complaint against the later civilian regime for having enacted a comprehensive amnesty law in 1986. In this case, the HRC noted with deep concern that the adoption of this law effectively excluded the possibility of investigations into past human rights abuses. The amnesty law thereby prevented the State party from discharging its responsibility to provide effective remedies to the victims of those violations. The HRC, consequently, found a violation of Article 7 CCPR, in conjunction with Article 2(3).¹¹⁷

48 After the entry into force of the Convention, in a number of individual complaints, the applicants claimed violations of various Articles of the Convention, including Article 4, on the grounds that the State party had failed to criminalize torture, to take any action to investigate their allegations of torture, and to bring the perpetrators to justice. Here, the CAT Committee did not rule on the claimed violation of Article 4 by stating that ‘there are insufficient elements to make a finding on the alleged violation of other provisions of the Convention raised by the complainant at the time of adoption of this decision’.¹¹⁸

49 The CAT Committee found for the first time a violation of Article 4(2) in the landmark case of Guridi v Spain.¹¹⁹ In this case, a Spanish court found three civil guards guilty of torture and sentenced each of them to imprisonment of four years, two months, and one day. The Supreme Court decided to reduce the prison sentences on the ground that the injuries suffered by the complainant had not required medical or surgical attention, but only first aid. Finally, the civil guards were granted pardon and were suspended from any form of public office for one month and one day. The CAT Committee ruled that pardoning civil guards, whom an independent court had found guilty of torture, violated the victim’s rights under Article 4(2). It stated that, ‘in the circumstances of the present case, the imposition of lighter penalties and the granting of pardons to the civil guards are incompatible with the duty to impose appropriate punishment’.¹²⁰ Although the decision lacks further reasoning, the broad interpretation of the victim status to invoke an individual complaint procedure by the CAT Committee has been an important development.

50 Regardless of the fact that the CAT Committee has adopted only few decisions under Article 4—also because cases were declared inadmissible for lack of substantiation or being manifestly unfounded¹²¹—the case of Guridi has demonstrated that Article 4 can be invoked in the individual complaint procedure. In view of contemporary human rights theory,¹²² the argument of the Spanish Government in the Guridi case that the interests of the victims were unaffected by the decisions of Government authorities in relation to perpetrators of gross violations of human rights, including torture, is no longer acceptable. It is beyond any doubt that victims of the crime of torture have a legal interest that those who tortured them are brought to justice. For many victims of torture, the punishment of the perpetrators constitutes a much more important form of reparation and justice than pecuniary compensation or any other relief.¹²³ Accordingly, Article 4, concerned with bringing the perpetrators to justice under criminal law, is linked to reparations in that it provides victims with a sense of satisfaction and justice. That is also why punishment of the perpetrator is explicitly provided for as a form of reparation in the UN Basic Principles and Guidelines on the Right to a Remedy and Reparation for Victims of Gross Violations of International Human Rights Law and Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law.¹²⁴ In order to claim such reparation, the victim, therefore, must enjoy the remedy of submitting an individual complaint against the respective authority under domestic law¹²⁵ as well as against the State party before the CAT Committee.

51 Further, criminalization under Article 4 is a precondition for other obligations under the Convention to be invoked, for example for Articles 5 to 9 and also for Article 14. The official recognition of individuals having been subjected to torture as victims through domestic procedures is the prerequisite for the exercise of the right to remedy and reparations enshrined in Article 14. This is closely linked to the States parties' obligation to make acts of torture punishable as criminal offence under national criminal law as the failure to enact legislation in line with Article 4 'obstructs the victim's capacity to access and enjoy his or her rights guaranteed under [A]rticle 14'.¹²⁶

52 These arguments apply to both paragraphs of Article 4. If the State party fails, to make torture a criminal offence at all, any victim of torture has the right to raise this violation of Article 4(1) by means of an individual complaint. If the criminal code of a State party does contain the crime of torture but the respective authorities fail to punish the perpetrators of an act of torture with appropriate penalties, the victim of such an act has the right to submit an individual complaint alleging a violation of Article 4(2) in accordance with Article 22.

¹²⁵ In Guridi v Spain, No 212/2002 (n 2) para 4.1, the Spanish Government in fact recognized that both the Supreme Court and the Court of Jurisdictional Disputes had held that a pardon may be subject to judicial review on the initiative of the victim. This argument seems to contradict its position in relation to the standing of the victim before the Committee.

1. Introduction¹

1 While Article 4 requires States parties to enact the crime of torture as part of their domestic criminal law, Article 5 stipulates an obligation for States parties to establish their jurisdiction over the crime of torture in a comprehensive manner in order to avoid safe havens for perpetrators of torture. In addition to the territoriality and flag principle, as well as the active and passive nationality principle laid down in Article 5(1), Article 5(2), for the first time in a human rights treaty, establishes the obligation of States parties to establish universal jurisdiction in all cases where an alleged torturer is present in any territory under their jurisdiction. The provisions of Articles 6 to 9 are closely related to Article 5 and further define the various steps which States need to take in order to bring suspected torturers to justice.

2 First, States must take the necessary legislative measures to establish jurisdiction in their respective domestic criminal codes in accordance with the various principles laid down in Article 5. States only enjoy in respect to the passive nationality principle in Article 5(1)(c) the discretionary power to decide whether or not to establish it. With respect to the territoriality, flag, active nationality, and universal jurisdiction principles, the obligation of States parties to entrust their courts with full jurisdiction is unambiguous. As the Committee against Torture decided in the Habré case against Senegal, the failure of the legislative power to establish universal jurisdiction (or any other type of jurisdiction required in Article 5) constitutes a violation of Article 5.

3 Secondly, the administrative and judicial authorities of States parties must also take specific steps in order to bring suspected torturers to justice. Under the territoriality, flag, and nationality principles in Article 5(1), criminal investigations should be initiated as soon as the authorities of a State party have sufficient information to assume that an act of torture has been committed in any territory under its jurisdiction, on board a ship or aircraft registered in that State, by one of its nationals or against one of its nationals (if the domestic law provides for jurisdiction under the passive nationality principle). Such investigations need to be conducted even when the suspected torturer is not present in the territory of the respective State or when the identity of the torturer is not yet known to the authorities. For the territorial State, the obligation to conduct prompt and impartial investigations, either ex officio or on the basis of a complaint, is also underlined by Articles 12 and 13 CAT. If the suspected torturer is outside the territory of the State which had initiated criminal investigations, its authorities may request extradition from another State, where this person is present, in accordance with Article 8 CAT. For torture cases, the Convention may even be considered as the legal basis for such extradition procedures.

4 In contrast to the territoriality, flag and nationality principles, the obligation to exercise universal jurisdiction only arises if the alleged offender is present in any territory under the jurisdiction of a State party. This is, however, the only condition for exercising universal jurisdiction. Other conditions, such as an extradition request by a third State, have clearly been rejected during the drafting of Articles 5 to 9, as was confirmed by the CAT Committee in the Habré case.² In other words, if the authorities of a State party have reasonable grounds to believe that an act of torture has been committed by a person present on its territory (the so-called forum State), they have an obligation under Article 6 to take him or her into custody (or to take other measures to ensure his or her presence) and to make a preliminary inquiry into the facts. In addition, the forum State shall notify the territorial, flag, and/or national States of its actions and the outcome of its preliminary inquiry. If any of these States requests extradition, the forum State has the choice of either extraditing the suspected torturer or of prosecuting the person before its domestic criminal courts (aut dedere aut judicare in accordance with Article 7). If no State requests extradition within a reasonable time, the forum State has no choice but to prosecute the alleged offender. While other States parties have no obligation under the Convention to request extradition, as was confirmed by the Committee in the Roitman Rosenmann case³ concerning the extradition of General Pinochet from the United Kingdom to Spain, all other States parties have an obligation under Article 9 to provide judicial assistance to the forum State by, for example, supplying all evidence at their disposal.

Accordingly, as of 2016, there have been twelve torture cases with proceedings under universal jurisdiction, out of which six were at the investigation stage (see TRIAL International et al, 69–70). For an in-depth analyses of national legislations and jurisprudence, particularly in relation to universal jurisdiction, see Cedric Ryngaert, 'Universal Criminal Jurisdiction over Torture: A State of Affairs' (2005) KU Leuven Faculty of Law, Institute for International Law, Working Paper No 66 (revised) <<https://www.law.kuleuven.be/iir/nl/onderzoek/working-papers/WP66e.pdf>> accessed 12 December 2017; Karen Janina Berg, Universal Criminal Jurisdiction as Mechanism and Part of the Global Struggle to Combat Impunity with Particular Regards to the Crime of Torture (Studienreihe des Ludwig Boltzmann Instituts für Menschenrechte, NWV, Neuer Wissenschaftlicher Verlag 2012); Luc Reydam, Universal Jurisdiction: International and Municipal Legal Perspectives (Oxford University Press 2003); Wolfgang Kaleck, 'From Pinochet to Rumsfeld: Universal Jurisdiction in Europe 1998–2008' (2009) 30 Mich J Int'l L 927.

5 In practice, States parties are extremely reluctant to exercise universal jurisdiction in torture cases. Except for the case of Zardad⁴ (in the United Kingdom), the few selected cases, in which the principle of universal jurisdiction under Article 5(2) was raised by the applicants, illustrate the attempts of States to avoid their respective responsibilities. As was illustrated by the cases of Al-Duri⁵ (in respect of Austria) and Almatov⁶ (in respect of Germany), the authorities usually fail even to arrest alleged perpetrators, thereby providing them with an opportunity to leave the country. The case of Ould Dah (in respect of France) shows that alternative measures to custody, such as judicial control orders, might fail to ensure the presence of suspected torturers. Even if the authorities of the forum State arrest a suspected torturer, extradition efforts might be undermined by reluctant Governments. In the case of General Pinochet, who was arrested by British authorities, the extradition request issued by a Spanish judge was not pursued by the Spanish Government with all the necessary vigour to secure his extradition to Spain. In the Habré case, the Government of Senegal even referred the case to the African Union and for a long time failed to enact the necessary legislative reforms to establish universal jurisdiction.

6 The Pinochet, Habré, and Bouterse cases illustrate that even former heads of State or Government are not immune from prosecution for acts of torture. But the International Court of Justice (ICJ), in Democratic Republic of Congo v Belgium,⁷ upheld the immunity of an incumbent Minister of Foreign Affairs for alleged crimes against humanity and war crimes. Similar to diplomatic and consular agents, certain holders of high-ranking governmental office, such as heads of State or Government and Ministers of Foreign Affairs, enjoy full immunity from jurisdiction in other States, both criminal and civil. This so-called immunity ratione personae is based on the notion that such protection is necessary to ensure the efficient performance of certain functions on behalf of the respective State. In the same judgment, the ICJ, therefore, confirmed that after ceasing to hold the position qualifying them for jurisdictional immunity, such persons also lose the protection of immunity ratione personae. They might, however, still enjoy functional immunity for all acts performed in the exercise of an official capacity (so-called immunity ratione materiae).

2.2 Analysis of Working Group Discussions

14 In response to an invitation of the Secretary-General to comment on the draft Swedish Convention, a number of Governments made general remarks in 1979 on the issue of jurisdiction over the offence of torture.

15 In written comments the United States firmly supported the creation of an obligation to prosecute or extradite as one of the most effective means of deterring torturers. In the opinion of the United States the fact that torture is an offence of special international concern meant that it should have broad jurisdictional bases in the same way as the international community had conferred broad jurisdictional bases in the Hijacking, Sabotage, and Protection of Diplomats Conventions. In brackets, the United States added that universal jurisdiction was appropriate since torture, like piracy, might well be considered an 'offence against the law of nations'. At the same time the United States objected to jurisdiction based on the nationality of the victim as an independent ground of jurisdiction and proposed the deletion of paragraph 1(c) of the original Swedish draft text. The opinion of the United States was that, although States would not be required to establish nationality of the victim as a basis for jurisdiction, such jurisdiction could be exercised under Article 8(3) of the original Swedish draft if in accordance with the internal law of the relevant State party.

16 The Portuguese Government noted that the provisions on universal jurisdiction could be regarded as contrary to Portuguese public order. Portugal went on to suggest that the last part of Article 8(2) of the Swedish draft should be drafted as follows: 'does not extradite him to another State Party which is competent under paragraph 1 of this article'. Portugal added that, while the competence provided for in Article 8 CAT did not coincide with the general rule governing the territorial scope of Portuguese criminal law (Article 53 of the Criminal Code), this would not be an obstacle to acceptance, since the rule establishes an exception in the case of a 'conflicting treaty'.

17 The USSR stated that it was necessary to conduct a careful study of the competence of the State with regard to crimes involving the use of torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, since the legislation of many States excluded the possibility of recognizing the competence of a foreign State in respect of crimes committed within their territory, on grounds related to the nationality of the offender or of the victim.

18 France suggested that the wording 'to establish its jurisdiction' in Article 8 should be replaced by 'to establish its competence to deal with offences ...'. France also suggested that it would be better to delete the reference to ships and aircraft in Article 8(1)(a) for the following reasons: that the proposed text was badly worded and would in any event have to be amended to read 'or on board an aircraft registered in that State or a ship flying the flag of that State'; that the wording did not cover all possible cases (continental shelf, etc.) and that it would therefore be better to keep to the single concept of 'territory', clarified, as necessary, by the legislation of each particular State. Concerning the establishment of competence by States parties, France argued that only the cases referred to in paragraph 1 should be retained, in view of the difficulties involved in establishing the facts in the case referred to in paragraph 2.

19 The United Kingdom suggested that the phrase 'offences referred to in article 7' be deleted and replaced with 'offences of torture'. The United Kingdom considered that the ultimate effectiveness of the Convention as a whole would depend on the general soundness and acceptability of the enforcement provisions as reflected in Articles 8, 11, and 14 and on the emphasis they would give to the means by which persons accused of torture could be brought to justice. Further, the United Kingdom felt that in contrast with offences of a more obviously international character, such as hijacking and attacks on internationally protected persons, the exceptionally wide extra-territorial jurisdiction conferred by Article 8 in respect of torture went beyond what was practicable. The United Kingdom went on to clarify that, in the United Kingdom, the criminal law, the jurisdiction of the criminal courts and criminal procedure, were based upon offences having been committed, broadly speaking, within the United Kingdom and that there was a general and well-established requirement for evidence to be given orally to provide an opportunity for cross-examination. For practical as well as judicial reasons, therefore, the United Kingdom stated that they would find it difficult to breach this territorial principle and to accept even a limited degree of extra-territorial jurisdiction. The United Kingdom went on to say that since the prosecution of a person accused of torture is likely to be more successfully undertaken in the territory where the offences occurred and where the evidence is available, the emphasis in these articles should be placed on extradition rather than on prosecution and the principle of aut dedere aut judicare (the duty to extradite or prosecute in international law) should apply. Further, the United Kingdom stated that the extradition provisions could usefully be strengthened by the inclusion of an article along the lines of Article 8 of the Hague Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Seizure of Aircraft which would require contracting States, inter alia, to include torture (as rigorously defined in a revised Article 1) as an extraditable offence in existing treaties and would provide the option of the Convention being a basis for extradition where no treaty exists between contracting States.

20 Morocco considered that Article 8(1)(c) was unclear and that it could give rise to tendentious applications and opened the question of the principle of the territoriality of penal legislation. It proposed the following wording for paragraph 1(c): 'When the victim is a national of that State and has been tortured (by a national of another State) on the territory of that State ...'. Morocco was of the opinion that the extradition measures recommended in Article 14 of the original Swedish draft would only be possible where a member State had received in its territory a national of another member State who had previously committed an offence in his State of origin. Except in that case, the principle of the territoriality of penal legislation applies fully and the act of agreeing to extradite a national to another member State, on the ground that the victim is a national of that State, would be equivalent to a reversion to the humiliating practice of 'capitulations', linked to the worst memories of the colonial era. For these reasons, Morocco urged that Articles 8, 11, and 14 be revised and, since they were based on a single concept, should be condensed into two Articles.

21 There was no discussion on this topic in the 1979 Working Group in contrast to the 1980 Working Group where this issue was discussed in depth. The 1980 Working Group had before it a copy of the revised Swedish text in which Article 5 corresponded to Article 8 of the original Swedish draft.¹⁵

22 While the Swedish proposal on universal jurisdiction was supported, in principle, by a considerable number of delegations including the United States, some delegations, in particular those of Australia, France, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom, had reservations, considering that universal jurisdiction over an offence such as torture would create problems under their domestic legal systems.

23 With regard to the proposed Article 5(1)(a) there was general agreement that territoriality should be a ground for jurisdiction with the only question being to what extent offences committed on board ships or aircraft or on the continental shelf should be assimilated to offences committed in the territory of the State, and how this should be reflected in the text of the Convention. France considered that it would be preferable to keep the single concept of 'territory', which could then be clarified as necessary. One delegate found the expression 'or on board aircraft or ships registered in that State', proposed as an addition by several delegations, 'somewhat unhappily phrased'. The delegation preferred the wording 'on board an aircraft registered in that State or a ship flying the flag of that State' whilst at the same time not opposing the consensus on the addition.

24 The text of Article 5(1)(a) was adopted as follows:

Each State Party shall take such measures as may be necessary to establish its jurisdiction over the offences referred to in Article 4 in the following cases:

- (a) When the offences are committed in any territory under its jurisdiction or on board an aircraft or ship registered in that State.

25 Concerning Article 5(1)(b), a delegate proposed the replacement of the word 'national' by the phrase 'public official or employee of that State'. Most delegates stated that the term 'national' was a widely used concept in international law in connection with the establishment of jurisdiction, and that they preferred this basis of jurisdiction, as formulated in the New York Hostages Convention. At the same time several delegates drew attention to the provisions of Articles 1 and 4, noting that there was a need to cover those nationals who were not officials or employees but who committed acts of torture with the consent or acquiescence of public officials or other persons acting in an official capacity or who were charged with complicity or participation in torture and that therefore the proposed replacement would make the Convention less effective.

26 One representative suggested that the first wording of Article 5(1)(b) be retained and that the proposed phrase 'public official or employee of that State' be inserted between brackets after the word 'national'. Another delegate proposed that Article 5(1) should be redrafted to read as follows:

Each State Party shall take such measures as may be necessary to prosecute persons who have committed the crimes mentioned in Article 4 of this Convention and who are in its territory and under its jurisdiction.

27 Greece suggested that Article 5(1)(b) be drafted as follows:

When the alleged offender belongs to one of the categories of individuals named under Article 1, paragraph 1 and is present in any territory under the jurisdiction of that State.

¹⁵ Report of the Working Group of the Commission on Human Rights (1980) UN Doc E/CN.4/1367.

Finally, the word 'national' in Article 5(1)(b) was placed in square brackets.

28 Several representatives requested the deletion of Article 5(1)(c) which, in their view, opened an unduly wide scope for repression and created difficulties for establishing proof. One delegate stated that he agreed to the retention of that paragraph—drawing attention to the existence of similar clauses in the Convention against the Taking of Hostages, as well as in the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of Crimes against Internationally Protected Persons, including Diplomatic Agents—but with the addition of the words 'and the alleged offender is discovered in its territory'. Other speakers proposed to make this provision optional. No agreement was reached on whether paragraph 1(c) should be retained and, if so, how it should be worded. The Soviet Union proposed a more fundamental change, suggesting that the whole of paragraph 1 of Article 5 should be replaced with the following text: 'Each State Party shall take such measures as may be necessary to prosecute persons who are in its territory and under its jurisdiction.' Article 5(1)(c) was placed in square brackets.

29 Paragraph 2 of Article 5 caused particular difficulties for those delegations which were opposed to the idea of universal jurisdiction with regard to torture. The French delegate stated that he was in favour of the deletion of Article 5(2), which was likely to create difficulties when the facts were being established. If it was decided to retain that Article, he proposed that the words 'after receiving a request for extradition' should be added after the words 'and it does not extradite him'. This proposal was supported by several other delegates including the Netherlands. Italy, on the other hand, considered that it would be desirable to establish an order of precedence between the different grounds of jurisdiction and suggested the following wording:

Each Member State shall take such measures as may be necessary to establish its jurisdiction over the offences referred to in Article 4 above in the following cases and according to the order of priority indicated below: (a), (b), (c)—as in the Swedish proposal, (d) when the accused is on its territory.

30 Several other representatives favoured retention of Article 5(2) as set forth in the revised Swedish draft. These delegates pointed out that either the omission of Article 5(2) or the proposed amendment could create a loophole in the Convention, thereby allowing potential safe havens for torturers. It was stated by one delegate that his basic concern about the inclusion of paragraph 2 was that it could, in certain circumstances, jeopardize the natural rights of an accused to a fair and impartial trial and could also create, in practice, serious international political tensions. Subsequently that delegate offered to withdraw his reservation in the interest of reaching a consensus.

31 Paragraph 3 did not give rise to any substantial discussion. While agreement had been reached on the text of paragraph 1(a), the Working Group agreed that discussion of paragraph 1(b) and (c) as well as of paragraphs 2 and 3 should be suspended to allow further consideration and consultation.

32 During the 1981 Working Group,¹⁶ Article 5(1)(b) and (c) were considered. It was decided by consensus that the square brackets enclosing the word 'national' in subparagraph b be removed. The Group decided by consensus to remove the square brackets enclosing subparagraph c and to add the words 'if that State considers it appropriate' at the end of the paragraph, thus adopting the wording of the Convention

¹⁶ Report of the Working Group of the Commission on Human Rights (1981) UN Doc E/CN.4/L.1576.

Against the Taking of Hostages. This decision was made following considerable discussion during which several delegates stated that they had strong reservations about this wording.

33 Turning to Article 5(2) of the revised draft some members again suggested the deletion of the paragraph as they were either opposed to the principle of universal criminal jurisdiction or to the difficulties to which the provision could give rise when establishing the facts. Several delegations indicated that they had difficulties, in view of their legal systems, in accepting an unconditional clause on universal jurisdiction. One representative proposed that if the paragraph were to be retained, the phrase 'after having received a request for extradition' should be added after the words 'and it does not extradite him'. Some speakers considered that the paragraph should be retained. They referred to the fact that corresponding paragraphs already appeared in many other comparable conventions such as the 1970 Hague Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Seizure of Aircraft, the 1973 Montreal Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts against the Safety of Civil Aviation, the 1973 New York Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of Crimes against Internationally Protected Persons, including Diplomatic Agents and the 1979 New York Convention against Taking of Hostages, and they emphasized that universal jurisdiction was desirable in order not to provide torturers with any places of refuge.

34 The Netherlands delegation accepted universal jurisdiction in principle and no longer advocated making the exercise of such jurisdiction dependent on the rejection of a request for extradition. Instead, it tabled a formal proposal to make the exercise of universal jurisdiction dependent 'upon complaint by an interested party'. This proposal was only supported by Australia. Other Western delegations felt that this formula could give rise to loose interpretations and open up loopholes. The Brazilian delegation preferred to make universal jurisdiction conditional on the refusal of a request for extradition. Since no agreement could be reached, it was decided to retain the paragraph in brackets.

35 During informal consultations the following text was proposed:

2 Each State Party shall likewise take such measures as may be necessary to establish its jurisdiction over such offences in cases where the alleged offender is present in any territory under its jurisdiction and it does not extradite him pursuant to Article 8 to any States mentioned in paragraph 1 of this article.

(a) Without prejudice to the foregoing paragraphs, an alleged offender should normally be tried by the State in whose territory the offence is committed.

Amongst other problematic issues, the discussions were complicated by the fact that this question could be dealt with under Article 5 (on jurisdiction) or under Article 7 (on prosecution). While numerous formulations were discussed during this period, the Working Group, during its public meeting, felt that, since the informal proposal could not be discussed owing to lack of time, it should be examined in detail the following year.

36 Article 5(3) was adopted by consensus.

37 A certain evolution in the position of several delegations could be observed in the course of debate in the 1982 Working Group on Article 5(2).¹⁷ France and the Netherlands explicitly supported the system proposed by Sweden while Australia remained the only Western country participating in the Working Group which did not support the inclusion of universal jurisdiction in the convention. The Netherlands delegation withdrew its 1981 proposal to make the exercise of universal jurisdiction dependent on a complaint by any interested party. At the same time, Brazil repeated its plea for making the exercise of universal jurisdiction dependent on the refusal of a request for extradition, expressing concern that universal jurisdiction could be exploited for political reasons and could result in trials on the basis of spurious accusations and fabricated evidence. This proposal was not supported by the Argentinian or the Uruguayan delegations who remained firmly opposed to the idea of universal jurisdiction based upon the fact that they considered torture not to be a crime of an international nature. The Argentinian delegation argued that cases in which a torturer would leave his own State where he enjoyed impunity were highly hypothetical and the system proposed to deal with such cases could be a source of controversy between States. This would be due to the fact that the intention of a State to prosecute a case of torture on the basis of universal jurisdiction could be interpreted by the State where the crime had been committed as a demonstration of lack of trust in its judicial system, a violation of its sovereignty and even as an interference in its internal affairs. Advocating for the inclusion of universal jurisdiction in the Convention, the United States responded to the Argentinian delegation that such jurisdiction was intended primarily to deal with situations where torture is a State policy and, therefore, the State in question does not prosecute its officials who conduct torture. For the international community to leave enforcement of the Convention to such a State would be essentially a formula for doing nothing. Universal jurisdiction could be used against official torturers who travel to other States or against torturers fleeing from a change of Government in their State if, for legal reasons, extradition was not possible.

38 In light of the suggestions made above, the Chairman-Rapporteur consulted several delegations regarding the possibility of adapting the text of Article 7. A modified version of the Article was submitted to the Working Group which made clear that in the case of the exercise of universal jurisdiction the standards of evidence required for prosecution and conviction should in no way be less stringent than those which apply in the case of jurisdiction on a nationality or territorial basis. This proposal was intended to meet the concern of those who feared that the exercise of universal jurisdiction might lead to trials on the basis of spurious accusations inspired by political motives. The proposal implied that Article 5(2) and Article 6(4) of the Swedish draft would be maintained.

39 The Australian Government was prepared to accept this proposal whilst at the same time retaining its reservations. The Brazilian delegation was prepared to accept the proposal of the Chairman-Rapporteur whilst maintaining its position on Article 5(2) that the establishment of universal jurisdiction should be made conditional on the refusal of a request for extradition. Where such a clause could not be included in Article 5(2), Brazil would consider making a declaration or reservation to that effect when becoming a party to the Convention.

40 Several delegates, favourable to the proposal in general terms, suggested drafting changes and a revised version was therefore tabled and subsequently underwent further amendments during the discussion. The Soviet delegation now made it clear that it could support the text. Explicit support was also voiced by the delegation of Senegal. The delegations of Argentina and Uruguay maintained their opposition but found themselves isolated in their position against the inclusion of universal jurisdiction in the Convention.

41 The report of the Working Group states explicitly that most speakers had indicated that their Governments were prepared to support the inclusion of a system of universal jurisdiction in the draft Convention and the revised version of Article 7 was reproduced, as it emerged finally from the discussion, in the first annex of the report. The report noted that all delegations who could accept the inclusion of universal jurisdiction in the draft Convention could support this text of Article 7, as well as the text of Article 5(2) and Article 6(4).

42 During the 1983 Working Group,¹⁸ the system of universal jurisdiction included in draft Articles 5, 6, and 7 was again considered. The discussion indicated that there had been no fundamental change in positions compared with the 1982 session of the Working Group.

43 Most speakers, with the exception of the Argentinian and Uruguayan delegations, were in favour of the principle of universal jurisdiction, holding it to be essential in securing the effectiveness of the Convention and arguing that territorial jurisdiction would not suffice to punish torture effectively as a State policy under the definition of Article 1. Reference was made in this context to the arguments set out in the report of the 1982 Working Group.

44 Some delegations maintained their reservations to the proposed system of universal jurisdiction which in their view could not be harmonized with certain principles of their penal legislation and would give rise to difficulties with regard to the availability of evidence as well as in other aspects. Reference was made here to the arguments set out in the report of the 1982 Working Group. Other delegations, while attaching importance to the system of universal jurisdiction, expressed the view that it was necessary to avoid abuses so as to afford greater guarantees to a State whose national has been incriminated. In this connection, the delegation of Senegal proposed the insertion in Article 5 of a provision reading as follows:

Each State Party shall likewise take such measure as may be necessary to establish its jurisdiction over such offences in cases where the alleged offender, who has been prosecuted or convicted by the state in which the offence was committed, is present under its jurisdiction and that State does not extradite him by virtue of article 3, paragraph 1.

45 The representative of Brazil proposed, in a spirit of compromise, a modified system under which the principle of universal jurisdiction would apply under certain conditions and on a subsidiary basis, only if the States of territorial or national jurisdiction did not request extradition within a set period or if such a request were denied.

46 Some delegations agreed that such a system might constitute a sound basis for compromise. The French delegate, on the other hand, declared that his Government preferred to adhere as closely as possible to the formulations concerning universal jurisdiction used in a number of recent international conventions. The Working Group decided that the Brazilian proposal should be further studied at a later stage. A similar decision was made with regard to the Senegalese proposal.

47 The discussions in the 1984 Working Group¹⁹ revealed that there had been an important change of position as compared to the 1983 Group. The inclusion of universal jurisdiction in the draft Convention was no longer opposed by any delegation.

48 The delegation of Argentina declared that the new Argentine Government supported universal jurisdiction as provided for in Articles 5, 6, and 7. The representative of Uruguay stated that his delegation continued to have doubts from a juridical point of view but that it did not wish to stand in the way of consensus on the question. While the Chinese delegation was in favour of the inclusion of universal jurisdiction, it considered the current formulation of the draft articles not entirely satisfactory. The representative of Senegal withdrew his proposal made during the 1983 Working Group stating that the concern which had prompted it had been met to a great extent by the text of Article 7. The Australian delegation reiterated the position adopted in 1982 that Australia still had some doubts about the desirability or practicality of the universal jurisdiction provisions in the Convention but was committed to the early negotiation of as strong a convention as possible and had therefore joined the growing consensus in support of universal jurisdiction in the draft Convention. The Australian delegation further expressed its view that such a system must be complemented by effective implementation provisions in the final text. Many other speakers reiterated the view that universal jurisdiction was an essential element for the effectiveness of a Convention against Torture.

49 The delegation of Brazil made explanatory remarks with regard to its 1983 compromise text on universal jurisdiction. The Brazilian delegation had been concerned with certain practical problems that could arise from its implementation as provided for in draft Articles 5, 6 and 7 as they stood. It had advanced its formulations in the hope that they would make it easier for other delegations to accept the inclusion of universal jurisdiction in the draft Convention. However, it remained flexible and, if its proposals were not generally acceptable, would not insist on them, remaining ready to discuss a solution on the basis of other formulations, including the present draft Articles 5, 6, and 7.

50 Most speakers expressed their preference for the text of draft Articles 5, 6, and 7 as a basis for discussion. It was pointed out that the formulation concerning universal jurisdiction should be as close as possible to that used in earlier treaties, such as the Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Seizure of Aircraft, the Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts against the Safety of Civil Aviation, and the International Convention against the Taking of Hostages. On the other hand, several speakers expressed an interest in exploring the possibility of achieving consensus by introducing in the present text the essence of certain elements borrowed from the Brazilian alternative proposals.

51 Some speakers considered that the Brazilian proposals had a legal drawback in that they would oblige a State to detain a person for a certain period during which that State had not established its jurisdiction over the case and extradition had not been requested. The delegation of Brazil pointed out that this problem could be solved by replacing the word 'establish' in Article 6(4) of the Brazilian proposal by the word 'exercise'. The Brazilian delegation further explained that while its alternative proposal was aimed at giving priority to the establishment of jurisdiction by States referred to in Article 5(1)(a), (b), and (c), it was not intended to create an automatic obligation for the requested State to extradite the alleged offender to those States, since extradition was a sovereign act to be decided in each case by the competent court of the requested State. Some speakers observed that it was both legally and politically proper to leave the State in which the offender was found such freedom to refuse extradition, because if extradition was requested by the State in which the acts of torture had taken place, it was doubtful whether the requesting State would really punish the offender.

52 At the end of the pre-sessional meetings all delegations except the Chinese delegation were prepared to accept the current texts of Articles 5, 6, and 7. The Chinese delegation expressed the view that the proposal on universal jurisdiction made by the Brazilian delegation could be regarded as a basis for discussion and that it was in principle acceptable. In its understanding, the basic spirit of the Brazilian proposal was that the exercise of jurisdiction in accordance with Article 5(1)(a), (b), and (c) should have priority over the exercise of jurisdiction based exclusively on the presence of an alleged offender in the territory of a State party. Only if the State having primary jurisdiction did not wish to exercise it, should jurisdiction be exercised by the State where the offender was found. After the close of the pre-sessional meetings, informal consultations continued with the Chinese delegation, taking into account that most delegations were not prepared to accept an automatic obligation for the requested State to grant extradition requests by States having primary jurisdiction. At the final meeting of the Working Group in the second week of the Commission, the Chinese delegation announced that it could now in principle accept universal jurisdiction as set out in the draft Convention. The Group thereupon agreed to adopt the current text of Articles 5, 6, and 7, without prejudice to the reservations of certain delegations which would be reflected in the report.

53 The representative of the German Democratic Republic, while stating that his delegation was not opposed to the adoption of Articles 5, 6, and 7, drew attention to the fact that the subject matter of the draft Convention differed considerably from that of such instruments as the Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Seizure of Aircraft and the Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts against the Safety of Civil Aviation which contained similar provisions and to which the German Democratic Republic was a party. In particular the provisions contained in Article 5(1)(c) caused problems to his authorities and therefore his Government had chosen to reserve its final position with respect to that question and would take into account the outcome of the deliberations concerning other elements of the draft Convention.

54 In written comments France attached particular importance to Articles 5 to 7 concerning universal jurisdiction competence which in the opinion of France significantly enhances the Convention and would permit the attainment of its essential objective, i.e. action to combat torture and to punish those who engage in it, regardless of the State party in which they are located. The Netherlands highlighted the issue of criminal proceedings in connection with acts of torture, attempts to commit torture and acts which constitute complicity or participation in torture as one of the important aspects in which the draft Convention goes beyond the 1975 Declaration. The most far-reaching of these provisions obliges States in whose territory a person suspected of such an offence is found, to submit the case to its competent authorities for the purpose of prosecution if it does not extradite him, even if the alleged offender is not its national and if the offence was committed abroad. The Norwegian Government highlighted the provisions on universal jurisdiction in the draft Convention as being of utmost importance. The Government of Tonga reserved its final position with respect to universal criminal jurisdiction. The US Government stated that it considered it of utmost importance that the draft Convention contains provisions which provide adequately for universal jurisdiction. In the opinion of the United States, the formulations contained in Articles 5, 6 and 7 were fully satisfactory representing the 'product of careful and thorough study of a complex matter and constituting the best compromise of varying points ...', and the three articles achieved 'the desired result of a workable, effective system of universal criminal jurisdiction'. Thailand stated that the underlying principle of Article 5 was already provided for by the Thai Penal Code. Regarding Articles 6 and 7, Thailand stated that it was a longstanding principle adopted by the Thai Criminal Procedure Code that, whenever it appears that any offence has been committed, the inquiry and prosecution regarding that case shall be undertaken without delay. They therefore welcomed the proposition under draft Article 6(3), specifying the requirement of notification regarding the assumption of court jurisdiction over the case between States parties concerned, as an appropriate co-operative measure. Venezuela suggested in their written comments that the use of the word 'jurisdicción' in Articles 5 to 7 of the draft should be clarified, so as to avoid difficulties of interpretation.

3. Issues of Interpretation

55 Article 5 requires States parties to the Convention to take measures as may be necessary to establish their jurisdiction in accordance with the territorial ((1)(a)), active nationality ((1)(b)) and universal jurisdiction principle (para (2)). Furthermore, States can also, if considered appropriate, create jurisdiction in accordance to the passive nationality principle ((1)(c)). Importantly, the jurisdiction required under Article 5 pertains only to torture as laid out in Article 4 of the Convention, and not to other forms of ill-treatment.²⁰

3.1 Article 5(1)(a): Territorial Jurisdiction

56 The territoriality principle constitutes the traditional ground for criminal jurisdiction under international law. Extraterritorial jurisdiction, therefore, is the exception. Territorial jurisdiction is derived from the principle of territorial sovereignty inherent in the notion of the territorial State. By virtue of this principle, every State can freely regulate and apply its own national criminal law within its sovereign territory to all persons, nationals, and aliens alike, who commit a criminal offence on its territory. It also means that aliens have a duty to obey the criminal law in the country they live in, reside or simply spend their vacation. Aliens cannot avoid criminal prosecution in accordance with the law of the country in which they are present by referring to the criminal law in their country of origin, where the incriminated behaviour might not constitute a criminal offence.

3.1.1 No Hierarchy between Different Grounds of Jurisdiction

57 During the drafting of the Convention, the territoriality principle was unsurprisingly the least controversial. The United Kingdom originally even argued that the Convention should only apply to the territoriality principle.²¹ Article IX (1) of the IAPL draft proposed a certain order of priority with the territoriality principle at the top.²² Article 8(1) of the original Swedish draft also mentioned the territoriality principle at the

²⁰ In its General Comment No 2, the CAT Committee states that it 'considers that articles 3 to 15 are likewise obligatory as applied to both torture and ill-treatment'. The authors of this commentary do not share this view. beginning, but without indicating a certain order of priority.²³ It suggested an obligation of States to establish their jurisdiction when the offence of torture is committed ‘in the territory of that State or on board a ship or aircraft registered in that State’. Eventually though, the final wording of the Convention does not endorse any formal hierarchy between the different jurisdictional heads established under Article 5.²⁴

58 Article 5(1)(a) requires States parties to establish jurisdiction over any offence stipulated in Article 4 which is committed on any territory under their jurisdiction or on board a ship or aircraft registered with them.

59 The formulation of ‘any territory under [the State party’s] jurisdiction’ has to be understood in a broad sense and applies beyond the territorial State’s land and sea territory as well as its air space. This reading has been already reflected in the travaux préparatoires of the Convention²⁵ and was further confirmed in the Committee’s General Comment No 2 (2008).²⁶ In the latter, the Committee against Torture made it explicit that the wording ‘any territory’ as used in Article 5 ‘includes all areas where the State party exercises, directly or indirectly, in whole or in part, de jure or de facto effective control, in accordance with international law’.²⁷ The obligations arising from Article 5 therefore also cover the offences stipulated in Article 4 ‘during military occupation or peacekeeping operations and in such places as embassies, military bases, detention facilities, or other areas over which a State party exercises factual or effective control’.²⁸ To a limited extent, the obligation to establish jurisdiction also comprises maritime areas outside of the State party’s territorial sea, such as oil-rigs or similar installations.²⁹

60 This territorial scope of the Convention received particular attention in relation to the US military detention facility in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba and the debate on the territorial scope of the US obligations under the Convention against Torture. Irrespective of the facility’s location outside of US territory, the US authorities are still required under the Convention to establish jurisdiction over crimes of torture committed in the facility due to the US’s de facto control over the territory leased from Cuba. In its General Comment No 2, the Committee makes explicit reference to places of detention and underlines that ‘the scope of “territory” under Article 2 must also include situations where a State party exercises, directly or indirectly, de facto or de jure control over persons in detention’.³⁰

61 While the encompassing territorial scope of the Convention was challenged during the Bush administration,³¹ the US eventually reviewed its position as reflected in its third to fifth periodic reports to the Committee. Accordingly, it acknowledges that the Convention applies to ‘all places that the State party controls as a governmental authority’, including ‘the United States Naval Station at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba and over all proceedings conducted there, and with respect to US-registered ships and aircraft’.³² Similarly, the obligation to establish jurisdiction over crimes of torture under the territorial heading also arises for those acts committed by US and UK troops in Iraq while exerting de facto control.

³¹ See the judgment in US Supreme Court, Rasul et al v Bush, President of the United States et al [2004] 542 US 466; see also the report of five Special Procedures of the UN Commission on Human Rights on the ‘Situation of detainees at Guantánamo Bay’ (2006) UN Doc E/CN.4/2006/120 para 11.

3.1.3 Flag Principle

62 In addition to the territorial notion of Article 5, Article 5(1)(a) explicitly also includes the flag principle. Thus, States parties are also required to extend their criminal jurisdiction regarding torture to conduct on board of ships or aircraft flying their flag regardless of the precise location where the crime is committed. If torture is, for example, committed on board an aircraft, which is registered in the United States, while flying through British airspace as part of an extra-ordinary rendition the US nevertheless has an obligation to establish jurisdiction over this act.

63 During the elaborations of the Convention, the introduction of the flag principle was not without debate. France suggested deleting the reference to ships or aircraft because the wording did not cover all possible cases, such as the continental shelf. According to France, it would therefore be better to keep to the single concept of ‘territory’, to be understood in the broad sense. This proposal was reflected in the revised Swedish draft, which referred to offences committed ‘in any territory under its jurisdiction’, without any reference to the flag principle.³³ However, as the flag principle must be distinguished from the territoriality principle, it was doubtful whether the wording in the revised Swedish draft also covered the obligation of the flag State to criminalize torture committed on board a ship or an aircraft registered in that State, as suggested by France. The Working Group, therefore, agreed already in 1980 on a final text which combines the broader concept of ‘in any territory under its jurisdiction’ with the explicit reference to offences committed ‘on board a ship or aircraft registered in that State’, taken from the original Swedish draft.

64 Importantly though, the obligations arising under the flag principle do not absolve other States parties from their obligation to establish jurisdiction under other heads, ie, the territorial or active nationality principle. Consequently, any CIA rendition flight crossing the airspace of another country, not only triggers the obligations of the USA under the flag principle but also eg those of the country whose airspace has been used under the territorial principle.³⁴

3.2 Article 5(1)(b): Active Nationality Principle

65 Article 5(1)(b) stipulates the obligation to establish jurisdiction in accordance with the active nationality principle. States parties are required to include into their domestic legal framework criminal provisions covering the offences specified in Article 4 and suspected to have been perpetrated by their own nationals. Importantly, the jurisdiction to be established under Article 5(1)(b) is unrelated to the location where the offences under Article 4 were committed, and therefore also covers crimes committed abroad. Hence, jurisdiction in line with the active nationality principle provides for an extraterritorial application of the Convention.

3.2.1 General Comment No 2

66 As mentioned above, the Committee elaborates in its General Comment No 2 on the meaning of the term ‘in any territory’ and endorses a wide interpretation which exceeds the mere territorial boundaries of the State party and includes all areas ‘over which a State exercises factual or effective control’³⁵. Somewhat surprisingly, the Committee further notes in the same paragraph of the General Comment that it sees this wide interpretation of the notion of territoriality as ‘reinforcing’ the active nationality principle.³⁶ While the Committee provides no further explanations on the relation between the wide scope of the territoriality notion and the active nationality principle, it seems to suggest that the two concepts are at least in parts overlapping.

3.2.2 Change of Citizenship and Dual Citizenship

67 In accordance with the Convention’s intent to avoid safe havens for torturers, one needs to interpret the term ‘national’ both as referring to the time of the offence as well as to the time of the prosecution. Should an alleged perpetrator of torture change his or her citizenship from State A to State B after having committed the crime, both State A and State B have the obligation to establish their jurisdiction under the active personality principle. Hence, a change of nationality after the act of torture was committed does not remove the obligation to exercise jurisdiction. The same holds true for cases of dual or multiple nationalities.³⁷

68 As a consequence of the above interpretation, more than one State party may have jurisdiction over the same case under the active nationality principle. This, however, does not mean that all States parties have to exercise their jurisdiction in parallel. A multiple prosecution for the same offence would be in contravention of the ne bis in idem principle. The purpose of the permissive interpretation of the active nationality principle is to close safe havens and ensure that an alleged perpetrator does not evade justice by changing his or her nationality. The Convention does not provide any ranking in case of overlapping jurisdictions and does not provide any guidance as to which State should eventually exercise its jurisdiction, provided that the State in question is indeed able and willing to perform its obligations in accordance with the Convention. In practice, the decision which State will exercise its jurisdiction depends, next to extradition regulations, on practical considerations such as the availability of evidence or the whereabouts of witnesses which are crucial for an effective investigation and prosecution.

³⁵ CAT/C/GC/2 (n 20) para 16.

³⁶ ‘The reference to “any territory” in article 2, like that in articles 5, 11, 12, 13 and 16, refers to prohibited acts committed not only on board a ship or aircraft registered by a State party, but also during military occupation or peacekeeping operations and in such places as embassies, military bases, detention facilities, or other areas over which a State exercises factual or effective control. The Committee notes that this interpretation reinforces article 5, paragraph 1 (b), which requires that a State party must take measures to exercise jurisdiction “when the alleged offender is a national of the State.” The Committee considers that the scope of “territory” under article 2 must also include situations where a State party exercises, directly or indirectly, de facto or de jure control over persons in detention’: see CAT/C/GC/2 (n 20) para 16.

³⁷ See Burgers and Danelius (n 25) 132; Berg (n 1) 161–62. For a case in which a prosecution under the active nationality principle is not possible since the alleged torture changed his nationality before the alleged crime was committed see the Bouterse case below §§ 124–26.

3.2.3 Torture by Non-Officials

69 The question of the scope of Article 5(1)(b) ratione personae was discussed during the Convention's drafting process. In the Working Group it was proposed to replace the word 'national' by the phrase 'public official or employee of that State'.³⁸ Other delegates, however, drew attention to the provisions of Articles 1 and 4 and the need to cover those nationals who are not themselves public officials but who committed acts of torture with the consent or acquiescence of public officials. In 1981, the Working Group finally decided to keep the word 'national' as a widely used concept in international law in connection with criminal jurisdiction.³⁹ The final wording of Article 5(1)(b) fully corresponds to the original Swedish draft.

70 Hence, if private individuals commit torture at the instigation of or with the consent or acquiescence of a public official, the active nationality principle also applies to them, irrespective of the nationality of the public officials concerned. If, for example, a US citizen and employee of a private US security company committed an act of torture in Iraq with the acquiescence of a public official, the United States must exercise its jurisdiction over this act, irrespective of whether the public official was a US military officer or an Iraqi police officer.⁴⁰

3.3 Article 5(1)(c): Passive Nationality Principle

71 Paragraph 1(c) of Article 5 provides States parties with the possibility to establish jurisdiction over torture offences under the passive nationality principle. Accordingly, the State party can include into its domestic legal framework provisions which provide for the prosecution of torture cases when the victim is a national of the State party. Similar to the active nationality principle in Article 5(1)(b), the jurisdiction to be established under Article 5(1)(c) provides for an extraterritorial application of the Convention and does not require the presence of the alleged perpetrator on the territory of the State party.

3.3.1 Facultative Nature of Jurisdiction under Passive Nationality Principle

72 Importantly, Article 5(1)(c) does not require, but merely offers the possibility for States parties to establish jurisdiction according to the passive nationality principle. This optional character of paragraph 1(c) is stipulated by the wording 'if that State considers it appropriate'. As such, the paragraph is 'no more than a reminder that States might find it desirable'⁴¹ to establish jurisdiction under the passive nationality principle.

73 Crucially, the formulation 'if that State considers it appropriate' refers only to the subparagraph 5(1)(c) and not to the entire sentence of 5(1).⁴² While the Convention provides for the possibility to establish jurisdiction under the passive nationality principle, it stipulates an obligation under the territorial, flag, and active nationality principle in Article 5(1)(a) and (b).

74 The fact that Article 5(1)(c) leaves it at the discretion of the State party and does not feature an obligation similar to the provisions under Article 5(1)(a) and (b) is mainly attributable to the passive nationality principle's contested standing in international law when compared to the territorial or active nationality principle.⁴³ Although modelled after Article 6(2)(d) of the International Convention against the Taking of Hostages, the passive nationality principle's inclusion into the Convention against Torture was heavily criticized.⁴⁴ Therefore, the Working Group decided in 1981 to add the words 'if that State considers it appropriate'.⁴⁵

3.3.1.1 Rosenmann v Spain (2002)

75 The non-obligatory nature of Article 5(1)(c) was at the centre of the deliberations of the Committee against Torture in the Roitman Rosenmann v Spain case in 2002, although the complaint referred only to violations of Articles 8, 9, 13, and 14 and was declared as inadmissible.⁴⁶ The complainant inter alia argued that the Spanish Foreign Ministry had violated Spain's obligation under the Convention by not adequately facilitating the exchange between the Spanish Audiencia Nacional and the British Home Office in the former's effort to prosecute Chilean General Pinochet who had been placed under detention in London in October 1998.⁴⁷ The Spanish judicial authority had filed an application for extradition of General Pinochet in order to try him for his role in crimes committed against Spanish citizens in Chile. However, after various appeals including to the House of Lords⁴⁸, the UK authorities ordered his release on medical grounds. Efforts by the Audiencia Nacional to appeal the UK's decision to release Pinochet were eventually scuppered by the Spanish Foreign Ministry's failure to deliver the pertaining appeal in a timely manner, what allowed Pinochet to return to Chile.

76 In its admissibility decision in the Rosenmann case, the Committee acknowledged that Spain's domestic legal framework provided for jurisdiction under Article 5(1)(c), but also argued that Articles 8 and 9 would not impose any obligation on the State party to seek an extradition or to file a pertaining appeal, if refused.⁴⁹ Importantly, 'in this connection, the Committee refers to article 5, paragraph 1(c)' and 'considers this provision to establish a discretionary faculty rather than a mandatory obligation to make, and insist upon an extradition request. Accordingly, the complaint falls ratione materiae outside the scope of the articles of the Convention invoked by the complainant'.⁵⁰ jurisdiction, but also as covering the legal framework's actual application. Hence, the Committee seems to suggest that the State party not only has the discretion to decide whether or not to establish jurisdiction in accordance with the passive nationality principle, but also to decide on a case by case basis whether the State party considers the investigation and prosecution of a specific suspected torturer 'as appropriate' even after jurisdiction according to the passive nationality principle has been already created. Furthermore, this discretion, as the reasoning of the Committee seems to suggest, not only includes the freedom to start, but also to stop already initiated proceedings. While one should be mindful that the Committee did not consider the complaint on its merits, the admissibility decision insinuates that the majority of the Committee saw the Spanish Foreign Ministry's unwillingness to forward the Audiencia Nacional's appeal in response to the UK's decision to release Pinochet on medical grounds as in conformity with the 'if that State party considers it appropriate' clause under Article 5(1)(c).

77 With this reasoning, the Committee appears to interpret the discretionary nature of Article 5(1)(c) not only as covering the creation of the corresponding domestic

⁴⁴ The inclusion of the passive nationality principle in the 'Hostage Convention' was essentially the result of a compromise between those States which accepted the principle as a common basis for jurisdiction and those which have traditionally opposed its use. Those States which supported its inclusion argued that it would avoid a gap in the jurisdiction and that, in any event, a State whose national is held hostage has a strong enough interest in the offence to justify its assertion of jurisdiction. Opposing States asserted that the inclusion of this principle would only lead to problems of conflicting claims of jurisdiction; cf Joseph J Lambert, Terrorism and Hostages in International Law: A Commentary on the Hostages Convention 1979 (Grotius 1990) 153.

78 This rather far-reaching interpretation of the discretionary faculty of Article 5(1)(c) remained not without criticism and was taken up in an individual opinion by Committee member Mr. Guibril Camara. In it, Camara argued that 'it seems that the majority [of the Committee members] has confused, on the one hand, the possibility to assume a (usually legislative) norm of general application concerning investigation and prosecution of acts falling with article 5, paragraph 1 (c), with, on the other hand, the pursuit of each individual case ...'. Consequently, '[t]he majority's view of the "discretion" in article 5 significantly weakens the likelihood that alleged offenders in cases of torture of extraterritorial nationals will be brought to justice, certainly as compared to the cases in article 5, paragraph 1 (a) and (b), where no such discretion applies.' Furthermore, even if the reading of the Committee's majority of the discretionary faculty of Article 5(1)(c) would be correct, it 'is more than questionable whether such an exercise of "discretion" by the executive [in the Rosenmann case the Spanish Foreign ministry as a branch of the Spanish Government] is consistent with the principles underlying the Convention ...', also given the Committee's previously 'consistent preference' for judicial resolution of allegations of torture arising within a State party.⁵¹

3.3.2 'Victim'

79 In certain particularly serious cases of torture and enforced disappearance, the notion of victim can also include family members of the person who was tortured or disappeared.⁵² Instructively for the notion of 'victim' as well as the application of the passive nationality principle, in March 2017, Spain's top-court in criminal matters, the Audiencia Nacional, agreed to investigate a complaint submitted by a Spanish woman, whose brother is alleged to have been abducted, tortured, and killed by the security forces of Syrian President Bashar al-Assad.⁵³ The case is among the first cases accepted by a European court in relation to crimes committed by the al-Assad regime and names eight

Syrian security officials as suspects, for who the Court requested the Syrian authorities to appoint legal representation.⁵⁴

80 Irrespective of this recent example, in comparison with other forms of jurisdictions under Article 5, the passive nationality principle finds relatively little application. In practice, pertaining cases very often fall also under the mandatorily required universal jurisdiction under Article 5(2) which, however, requires the presence of the alleged perpetrator on the territory of the State party.

3.3.3 'Is a national of that State'

81 If established, jurisdiction under Article 5(1)(c) covers only offences referred to in Article 4 which were inflicted on citizens of the State party. Residents, visitors, or other persons present on the territory of the State party do not fall under the scope of the passive nationality principle as stipulated in the Convention.

82 A notable exception in this regard were the judicial developments in Spain in relation to the Guatemala Genocide case.⁵⁵ The case was based on complaints filed against eight Guatemalan military members, who were alleged to be responsible for genocide, torture, and other crimes during the civil war from 1962 to 1996. After a series of appeals, which mainly evolved around the question whether Spanish courts indeed had jurisdiction,⁵⁶ the Spanish Supreme Court (Tribunal Supremo) eventually held in 2003 that Spain had jurisdiction over the case, however—in line with the passive nationality principle—only in relation to acts against Spanish citizens. Guatemalan victims of the alleged crimes, for example Guatemalan Mayas, were excluded from resorting to Spanish courts since they would fall outside of the scope of the passive nationality principle and would also lack any 'legitimizing link' such as the presence of the alleged offenders on Spanish territory which would allow them to resort to universal jurisdiction in Spain.⁵⁷ Surprisingly though, in 2005, Spain's Constitutional Court (Tribunal Constitucional) overturned the exclusion of non-Spanish citizens from the case arguing that the right to effective constitutional protection would also include non-citizens. According to the Court, requiring a link such as the presence of the alleged perpetrator on Spanish territory or the Spanish citizenship of the alleged victims, would result in an unjustified restriction of the constitutional right to effective judicial protection' as guaranteed in the Constitution of Spain.⁵⁸

3.3.4 Change of Citizenship

83 In the case of a change of nationality or dual nationality, the same permissive interpretation in accordance with the general purpose of the Convention can be applied as in relation to the active nationality principle. If, for example, a Chilean victim of torture under the Pinochet regime was granted asylum in Spain and acquired later Spanish citizenship, Spain is authorized, although not obliged, to establish its criminal jurisdiction over the case under the passive nationality principle.

3.3.4.1 Pinochet (France)

84 A case in point provides the attempted prosecution of General Pinochet by naturalized French citizens. Triggered by General Pinochet's arrival in the UK in 1998, the former Chilean citizens filed a complaint with a Paris court, in which they alleged to have suffered torture under Chile's military regime. Irrespective of the complainants being Chilean citizens at the time of the alleged crime, a French judge issued an arrest warrant based on the passive nationality principle as provided by the French Criminal Procedure Code.⁵⁹

3.3.4.2 Habré case (ICJ)

85 The relation between the naturalization of alleged torture victims and the passive nationality principle was also raised in the ICJ's deliberation on the admissibility of the case Belgium v Senegal regarding the prosecution of former Chadian dictator Hissène Habré.⁶⁰ Belgium claimed in its submission admissibility of its complaint on the basis of its status as a State party to the Convention as well as due to its alleged 'special interest'. The latter, as Belgium argued, was derived from the passive nationality principle under the Convention under which naturalized Belgians, former Chadians, alleged to have suffered torture during Habré's dictatorship. Eventually, though, the ICJ did not consider Belgium's admissibility claim on the basis of the passive nationality principle, but was satisfied with Senegal's and Belgium's standing as States parties to the Convention and what the Court considered as entailing erga omnes obligations.⁶¹ The decision of the Court's majority not to consider Belgium's claim due to a 'special interest' on the basis of the passive nationality principle did not remain without criticism, including the separate opinion of Judge Skotnikov⁶² and the dissenting opinion of Judge Sur.⁶³

⁶² 'The Court has a duty under its Statute to settle disputes—when it has jurisdiction to do so—unless there are circumstances preventing it from proceeding with the adjudication of a claim or a part of it. Senegal has contested Belgium's entitlement to exercise passive personal jurisdiction in the Mr. Habré case. Accordingly, when the Court discards, without explanation, a part of Belgium's claim by reducing its status in the present proceedings to that of any State party to the Convention against Torture, it fails in its duty': ibid 481 (Separate Opinion of Judge Skotnikov) para 8ff.

⁶³ According to Judge Sur the fact that the Belgian nationals (former citizens of Chad) acquired Belgian nationality several years after the facts, and thus relied on this naturalization vis-à-vis Senegal raised difficulties, since Senegal only recognizes Belgium's passive jurisdiction in respect of victims who possessed Belgian nationality at the time of the facts. Furthermore, Sur argues, 'under the Convention against Torture, the parties are not obliged to establish their passive criminal jurisdiction, meaning that the other parties are not obliged to recognize it, in particular when their own criminal law makes no provision for it. Accordingly, Belgium's request for extradition became inadmissible, as did its right to request that Senegal

3.4 Article 5(2): Universal Jurisdiction

86 Article 5(2) requires States parties to introduce into their legal framework provisions establishing jurisdiction over any torture offence stipulated in Article 4 where the alleged offender is present in any territory under its jurisdiction, irrespective where the alleged crime was committed and the perpetrator's or victim's nationality. This universal jurisdiction has to be exercised unless the State party decides to extradite the suspected torturer pursuant to Article 8 to any State with jurisdiction under the territorial and flag, active, or passive nationality principle.⁶⁴

3.4.1 Relation to Articles 6 and 7

87 In general, Article 5 is closely related to Articles 6 and 7. While Article 5 requires to establish the jurisdiction for the investigation and potential prosecution of an alleged perpetrator, Article 6 and 7 detail the ensuing steps once the alleged perpetrator is under the State party's jurisdiction.

88 With regard to Article 5(2) as soon as an alleged torturer is present in any territory under a State party's jurisdiction, the Government is according to Article 6(1) under an obligation to ensure his or her presence by taking effective measures, eg by taking the person into custody. The criminal investigation authorities shall immediately make a preliminary inquiry into the facts in accordance with Article 6(2) and notify all States referred to in Article 5(1), above all the alleged torturer's home State and the territorial State, of the custody, investigations and its further intentions relating to the case and the possible exercise of universal jurisdiction in accordance with Article 6(3) and (4).⁶⁵ The territorial State, the home State of the suspected torturer and other States parties are required by Article 9 to provide judicial assistance, including the supply of all evidence at their disposal.

89 If any of the States parties with jurisdiction under the territoriality, active or passive nationality principle requests extradition according to Article 7, the relevant authorities of the State where the alleged torturer is present⁶⁶ must take a decision whether to extradite or to prosecute. If the State party opts for extradition, it must comply with the relevant provisions in Article 8, with the principle of non-refoulement in Article 3 and ensure, at the same time, that the State requesting extradition is not shielding the alleged torturer exercise its criminal jurisdiction, since it no longer had a direct right to invoke it as an injured State.' Since the Court did eventually not render a decision on Belgium's admissibility claim under the passive nationality principle, the question of the validity of the argument remains unresolved. If one limits the analysis to the context of the Convention against Torture, it is, however, clear that Belgium can establish in its domestic legal framework jurisprudence over torture perpetrated against its citizens. This voluntary establishment of jurisdiction under the passive nationality principle is irrespective of whether other States do recognize it or when the alleged victims obtained their citizenship. Whether this established jurisdiction can be enforced extraterritorially by requesting the extradition of the alleged perpetrator, ie, Hissène Habré, has to be evaluated separately; see ibid 605 (Dissenting Opinion of Judge Ad Hoc Sur) para 21; see also ibid 481 (Separate Opinion of Judge Skotnikov); see also Mads Andenas and Thomas Weatherall, 'II. International Court of Justice: Questions relating to the obligation to extradite or prosecute (Belgium v Senegal) Judgement of 20 July 2012' (2013) 62 ICLQ 753, 766.

⁶⁶ Note that the State party must make this decision irrespective under which jurisdiction it might prosecute the alleged perpetrator as long as the alleged perpetrator is present on its territory. Art 7(1) is not limited to the presence of a suspect who is held under universal jurisdiction according to Art 5(2) but also covers situations in which a suspect is present in a State party with jurisdiction under the territorial, active or passive nationality principle.

against proper criminal prosecution and punishment in accordance with the letter and spirit of Articles 4 and 5. If a State party opts for prosecution, it has to submit the case to its competent authorities which have to take their decision in the same manner as in the case of any ordinary offence of a serious nature under the law of that State. Furthermore, they must ensure that the standards of evidence required for prosecution and conviction are not less stringent than those which are applied under territoriality or nationality jurisdictions, as stated explicitly in Article 7(2).⁶⁷ In other words, if the prosecuting authorities, after having carried out the necessary investigations, arrive at the conclusion that the information provided by the victims, by other States, inter-governmental or non-governmental organizations is not sufficient to justify a formal prosecution, they may, of course, close the proceedings. On the contrary, the suspect must be assisted in communicating with the nearest embassy or consulate of his or her home State, as provided for in Article 6(3)⁶⁸, and, by virtue of Article 7(3) 'shall be guaranteed fair treatment at all stages of the proceedings'.

3.4.2 Obligation to Establish Jurisdiction

90 The obligation to establish universal jurisdiction over torture as required under Article 5(2) is as compulsory as those pertaining to the territorial or active nationality principle. There is nothing in the Convention what would lend itself for an interpretation that the States parties' obligation to establish universal jurisdiction would be of a lower priority. Nevertheless, in its reporting procedure, the Committee had to repeatedly take issue with States parties failing to establish the required jurisdiction.⁶⁹

3.4.2.1 Proceedings against Hissène Habré

3.4.2.1.1 Overview

91 The legal developments in relation to the investigation, prosecution, and eventual sentencing of former Chadian authoritarian leader Hissène Habré are particularly instructive when it comes to analysing the Convention against Torture's Articles 5, 6, and 7. The case adjudicated before national Senegalese courts, the Committee against Torture, the ICJ, the ECOWAS Court of Justice, and eventually before the for this purpose established Extraordinary African Chambers (EAC) sheds light on several pertaining issues, particularly on the obligation to establish the required jurisdiction under Article 5(2) and related, the duty to prosecute or extradite under Article 7.

92 Hissène Habré was Chad's president from 1982 to 1990. During his regime, approximately 40,000 political murders and systematic acts of torture were committed.⁷⁰

After being ousted in a coup, Mr. Habré fled to Senegal where he was residing largely unaffected by his violent past. Eventually, in January 2000, seven Chadian nationals living in Chad filed a complaint with an examining magistrate in Senegal in which they alleged to have been tortured in Chad by agents of the Chadian State answerable directly to then President Habré. Consequently, in February 2000, the examining magistrate charged Hissène Habré with being an accomplice to acts of torture, placed him under house arrest and opened an inquiry against a person or persons unknown for crimes against humanity.

93 Still in February 2000, Mr. Habré applied to the Indictment Division of the Dakar Court of Appeal (Cour d'appel de Dakar) for the charge against him to be dismissed. The arguments brought forward were basically threefold: first, Senegal ratified the Convention against Torture in 1986, hence any conduct by Habré prior to Senegal becoming a State party was inadmissible ratione temporis. Second, since the Convention was argued to be not a self-executing treaty, and legislation implementing the Convention into the Senegalese legal framework was missing, Article 5 could not be invoked for any alleged crimes committed also after Senegal had become party to the Convention. Third, international customary law would be insufficient for the filing of a criminal complaint at a Senegalese court.⁷¹

94 On 4 July 2000, the Court of Appeal dismissed the charge against Hissène Habré and the related proceedings on the ground of lack of jurisdiction. According to the Court 'Senegalese courts cannot take cognizance of acts of torture committed by a foreigner outside Senegalese territory, regardless of the nationality of the victims: the wording of Article 669 of the Code of Criminal Procedure excludes any such jurisdiction.'⁷² Remarkably, the Court of Appeal also held that 'the Senegalese legislature should, in conjunction with the reform undertaken to the Penal Code, make amendments to Article 669 of the Code of Criminal Procedure by including therein the offence of torture, whereby it would bring itself into conformity with the objectives of the Convention.'⁷³

95 Against this decision the Chadian complainants filed an appeal three days later with Senegal's Court of Cassation (Cour de cassation) and demanded the proceedings to be reopened, arguing that the ruling of the Court of Appeal was contrary to the Convention against Torture and that a domestic law could not be invoked to justify the failure to apply the Convention. The Senegalese Court of Cassation, however, confirmed the ruling of the Court of Appeal on 20 March 2001 stating, inter alia, that no procedural text confers on Senegalese courts a universal jurisdiction to prosecute and judge, if they are found on the territory of the Republic, presumed perpetrators of or accomplices in acts [of torture] . . . when these acts have been committed outside Senegal by foreigners; the presence of Hissène Habré cannot in itself justify the proceedings brought against him.⁷⁴

In essence, Senegal's highest court brought the domestic proceedings against Mr. Habré to a close by arguing that the court lacked jurisdiction over the case. Although Senegal's constitution stipulated that international treaties are directly applicable,⁷⁵

the Convention could not be applied since the Convention itself, so the reasoning, would require domestic implementation. But in absence of the required implantation, requiring an amendment of Article 669 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, no jurisdiction as required under Article 5(2) would be available.

96 Not directly connected to the proceedings in Senegal, on 19 September 2005, after four years of investigation, a Belgian judge issued an international arrest warrant for Hissène Habré, charging him with genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes, torture, and serious violations of international humanitarian law.⁷⁶ The investigation had been triggered by a complaint filed by Chadian exiles who had acquired the Belgian citizenship. Accordingly, their complaint was based on the passive nationality principle as offered by Article 5(1)(c) in the Convention and provided by domestic Belgian law. The same day, Belgium issued an extradition request to Senegal citing, inter alia, the Convention against Torture. In response to the developments in Belgium, the Senegalese authorities arrested Hissène Habré on 15 November 2005. However, on 25 November 2005, the Indictment Division of the Dakar Court of Appeal stated that it lacked jurisdiction on the extradition request.⁷⁷

97 On 26 November 2005, the Senegalese Minister of the Interior placed Hissène Habré 'at the disposal of the President of the African Union' and announced that Habré would be expelled to Nigeria within 48 hours. The following day already, however, the Senegalese Minister of Foreign Affairs stated that Mr. Habré would remain in Senegal and that, following a discussion between the Presidents of Senegal and Nigeria, it had been agreed that the case would be brought to the attention of the next Summit of Heads of State and Government of the African Union in January 2006.

98 On 24 January 2006, the African Union decided at its meeting in Khartoum 'to set up a Committee of Eminent African Jurists to consider all aspects and implications of the Hissène Habré case as well as the options available for his trial' and to submit a report to its next session in July 2006.⁷⁸ This Committee eventually recommended the prosecution of Habré in Senegal.⁷⁹ Following the recommendation of the Committee of Eminent African Jurists, and also under the influence of the recent decision by the Committee against Torture in the case *Guengueng et al v Senegal*⁸⁰, the African Union decided at its July summit 'to consider the Hissène Habré case as falling within the competence of the African Union' and to 'mandate the Republic of Senegal to prosecute and ensure that Hissène Habré is tried, on behalf of Africa, by a competent Senegalese court with guarantees for a fair trial'.⁸¹ In response, Senegalese President Wade accepted the African Union's decision, ordered Senegal's legal framework to be amended as to facilitate universal jurisdiction over the case of Hissène Habré, and required up-front funding for the trial.

99 In reaction to the outcome of the African Union summit, Habré filed in October 2006 an application with the Court of Justice of the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) in which he claimed that his rights would be violated if proceedings against him were to be started. In its response, the ECOWAS Court ordered Senegal to comply with the principle of non-retroactivity in its endeavour to hold Habré accountable for the crimes committed between 1982 and 1990. Furthermore, and arguably more consequential, the ECOWAS Court concluded that Habré could only be tried before a ‘special and ad hoc procedure of international character’.⁸² Following the decision of the ECOWAS Court of Justice and the relentless campaigning of victims of the Habré regime, in January 2011, the African Union proposed a plan for the creation of ‘extraordinary chambers’ within the Senegalese justice system with judges to be appointed by the African Union. However, in May 2011, Senegal rejected the proposal of the African Union and ended negotiations on the creation of a court for the purpose of trying Habré.

100 A crucial turning point in the proceedings regarding Hissène Habré was reached in July 2012, when the ICJ ruled that ‘Senegal must, without further delay submit the case of Mr. Hissène Habré to its competent authorities for the purpose of prosecution, if it does not extradite him’.⁸³ As a consequence, Senegal and the African Union revived the plan for the creation of the Extraordinary African Chambers (EAC) within the Senegalese court system. One year later, on 2 July 2013, the EAC indicted Habré for war crimes, crimes against humanity, and torture and ordered his pre-trial detention. More than 1000 victims and relatives registered as civil parties.

101 Habré was convicted in the first instance on 30 May 2016.⁸⁴ Eventually, on 27 April 2017 the appeals chamber confirmed the convictions for war crimes, crimes against humanity, and torture and sentenced Hissène Habré to life imprisonment.⁸⁵

3.4.2.1.2 The Habré case before the Committee against Torture— Guengueng et al v Senegal

102 In April 2001, as a response to the decision of the Senegalese Court of Cassation and the resulting blockage of any national avenues to hold Habré accountable, the Chadian complainants filed a complaint with the Committee against Torture under Article 22(3).⁸⁶ In their complaint, the applicants claimed to be victims of a violation by Senegal of Article 5(2) and Article 7 CAT. As for the alleged violation of Article 5(2), the complainants took particular issue with the Court of Cassation’s reasoning that the otherwise constitutionally guaranteed direct applicability of international treaties would not apply since the Convention against Torture requires legislative measures to implement the treaty. Furthermore, the complainants raised that Article 669 of the Code of Criminal Procedure—which enumerates the cases in which proceedings can be brought against foreigners in Senegal for acts committed abroad—has not been amended. On this basis, the Court of Cassation had argued, that ‘the presence in Senegal of Hissène Habré cannot in itself justify the proceedings’.⁸⁷

103 Before engaging in the merits, Senegal challenged the complaint’s admissibility, arguing that the applicants lacked standing to submit a complaint under Article 22 since they were neither Senegalese nor residing in Senegal. This objection was, however, dismissed by the Committee, which held that the question whether a complainant is effectively subject to the jurisdiction of the State party does not depend on his or her nationality. Since the complainants had sought to pursue their case within the Senegalese legal system, they had been under the State party's jurisdiction and hence their complaint was admissible.⁸⁸

104 In response to the complainants alleged violation of Article 5(2), the Government of Senegal did not deny that it was lacking the jurisdiction required under Article 5(2), but argued that 'under the Convention a State party is not bound to meet its obligations within a specific time frame' and that 'Senegal is engaged in a very complex process that must take account of its status as a developing State and the ability of its judicial system to apply the rule of law'.⁸⁹ Hence, Senegal acknowledged its obligation to establish jurisdiction under Article 5(2), but argued that the required legal reforms would need time and therefore had not yet been implemented.

105 In response to the State party's argument that Senegal was cognizant of its obligation to establish jurisdiction under article 5(2), but confronted with a complex and lengthy implementation process, the complainants referred to Article 16 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties arguing that a State party is immediately bound by the obligation arising from an international treaty, from the moment the instrument of ratification is deposited.⁹⁰ Furthermore, referring to Article 27 of the Vienna Convention, the complainants argued that Senegal was not in the position to invoke provisions of internal law as a justification for its failure to perform its treaty obligations.⁹¹

106 As a subsidiary argument, the complainants also contended that, even if one would accept that a State party was not immediately bound by its ratification of the Convention, Senegal violated Article 5(2) by not adopting the appropriate legislation within a reasonable time considering that fifteen years had passed since Senegal's ratification of the Convention in 1986. The complainants noted that the Committee had already reminded Senegal to introduce 'explicitly in its national legislation ...' provisions which 'permit the State party to exercise universal jurisdiction as provided in article 5 et seq of the Convention ...' when discussing Senegal's second periodic report in 1996.⁹² In its response then, Senegal stated that it 'intended to honour its commitments, in the light of the Committee's conclusions and in view of the primacy of international law over internal law'.⁹³

107 In May 2006, the Committee published its decision on the Guengueng et al v Senegal case. For the first time in an individual complaint, the Committee found a State party in violation of Article 5(2). Accordingly, Senegal failed to uphold its obligation to take such measures as may be necessary to establish its jurisdiction over such offences as stipulated in Article 4 in cases where the alleged offender is present in any territory under its jurisdiction and it does not extradite him or her pursuant to Article 7 to any of the States mentioned in Article 5(1).⁹⁴ The Committee further noted that the State party had not contested the fact that it had not taken 'such measures as may be necessary' in keeping with Article 5(2), and observed that also the Court of Cassation in 2001 itself considered that the State party had not taken such measures. In its reasoning the Committee took up the subsidiary argument put forward by the complainants and based its finding of a violation of Article 5(2) on the consideration that ‘the reasonable time frame within which the State party should have complied with its obligation has been considerably exceeded’.⁹⁵

108 In addition to the violation of Article 5(2), the Committee also found Senegal to have breached its obligations under Article 7.⁹⁶ The Committee concluded that the ‘State party was obliged to prosecute Hissène Habré for alleged acts of torture unless it could show that there was not sufficient evidence to prosecute, at least at the time when the complainants submitted their complaint in 2000’.⁹⁷ In addition, following Belgium’s extradition request from September 2005, the Committee concluded ‘that by refusing to comply with the extradition request the State party has failed again to perform its obligations under article 7 of the Convention’.⁹⁸

3.4.2.1.3 The Habré case before the International Court of Justice—Questions Relating to the Obligation to Prosecute or Extradite (Belgium v Senegal)

109 The obligation to establish jurisdiction under Article 5(2) and whether Senegal had violated it in the Habré case was also considered by the ICJ as part of Belgium’s application to the Court in 2009, which was decided in 2012.⁹⁹

110 Following the decision of the Committee against Torture in the Guengueng et al case¹⁰⁰ in 2006, Senegal undertook several legal reforms pertaining to its obligations under Article 5. These reforms included the extension of jurisdiction over torture and other crimes committed by foreign nationals outside of Senegal, irrespective of the victim’s nationality.¹⁰¹ Furthermore, a constitutional reform precluded the principle of non-retroactivity from the prosecution of crimes which were already crimes under international law at the time when they were committed.¹⁰²

111 When Belgium filed in 2009 its application to the ICJ, the underlying dispute had been, by Belgium’s own admission, already resolved due to Senegal’s legal reforms in 2007 and 2008. Hence, ‘any dispute that may have existed ... had ended by the time the Application was filed’, and the Court consequently—in absence of an ongoing dispute—lacked the jurisdiction to consider whether Senegal had violated its obligations under Article 5(2).¹⁰³ As a consequence of Senegal’s legal reforms, the ICJ was not in the

¹⁰¹ The amended Article 669 of the Code of Criminal Procedure read as follows: ‘Any foreigner who, outside the territory of the Republic, has been accused of being the perpetrator of or accomplice to one of the crimes referred to in Articles 431-1 to 431-5 of the Penal Code ... may be prosecuted and tried according to the provisions of Senegalese laws or laws applicable in Senegal, if he is under the jurisdiction of Senegal or if a victim is resident in the territory of the Republic of Senegal, or if the Government obtains his extradition.’ Furthermore a new Article 664b was also incorporated into the Code of Criminal Procedure, according to which ‘[t]he national courts shall have jurisdiction over all criminal offences, punishable under Senegalese law, that are committed outside the territory of the Republic by a national or a foreigner, if the victim is of Senegalese nationality at the time the acts are committed’: see ICJ Reports 2012 422 (n 60) para 28.

¹⁰² ICJ Reports 2012 422 (n 60) para 31.

¹⁰³ ibid 48; the ICJ also dismissed Belgium’s claim that Senegal was in violation of international customary law for not prosecuting Habré. The Court concluded to lack the required jurisdiction since none of the pertaining diplomatic correspondences between Belgium and Senegal referred to violations of customary international law, hence there was no dispute on which the ICJ could base its jurisdiction. The Court notes ‘[h]owever, the issue whether there exists an obligation for a State to prosecute crimes under customary international law that were allegedly committed by a foreign national abroad is clearly distinct from any question of compliance with that State’s obligations under the Convention against Torture and raises quite different legal position to rule on the merits whether Senegal had indeed violated its obligation under Article 5(2) of the Convention.

112 However, while the ICJ was not in the position to directly consider the merits of Belgium's claim regarding Senegal's violation of Article 5(2), the Court did so implicitly when considering the merits of the violations under Article 6(2) and 7(1) which had been also alleged by Belgium. In this context, the Court asserted that the performance of the obligation to establish universal jurisdiction over the crime of torture under Article 5(2) is a necessary condition for enabling a preliminary inquiry under Article 6(2), and for submitting the case to the State party's competent authorities for the purpose of prosecution under Article 7(1).¹⁰⁴ Together, these obligations aim at enabling proceedings against the suspect, in the absence of extradition, and to achieve the objective and purpose of the Convention, which is to increase the effectiveness of the struggle against torture by avoiding impunity.¹⁰⁵ The interrelatedness between Articles 5, 6, and 7 and the belated establishment of jurisdiction under Article 5(2) in 2007 and 2008 not only deprived the relevant Senegalese courts in 2000 and 2001 of the required jurisdiction, but also 'necessarily affected Senegal's implementation of the obligations imposed on it by Article 6, paragraph 2, and Article 7, paragraph 1, of the Convention'.¹⁰⁶

113 With regard to the timing of the implementation of the obligations under the Convention, the ICJ held that 'the obligation for the State to criminalize torture and to establish jurisdiction over it ... has to be implemented by the State concerned as soon as it is bound by the Convention'.¹⁰⁷ Referring to Article 27 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, which reflects customary law, the ICJ held that Senegal cannot justify its breach of the obligation provided for in Article 7(1) of the Convention against Torture by invoking provisions of its internal law or the fact that it did not adopt the necessary legislation pursuant to Article 5(2) of that Convention until 2007.¹⁰⁸

114 Overall, although the ICJ did not render any decision on the merits of the alleged violation of Article 5(2), the wording of its decision strongly implies to concur with the decision of the Committee against Torture in the Guengueng et al case that Senegal had been in violation of its obligation to establish jurisdiction under Article 5(2) until the legal reforms in 2007 and 2008. This non-performance of its obligation had further ramifications for Senegal's performance of its obligations under Articles 6(2) and 7 for which the ICJ eventually found Senegal to be in violation.¹⁰⁹

3.4.3 Presence Requirement

3.4.3.1 'Have reason to suspect'

115 The only requirement for a State party to have jurisdiction over a torture case under Article 5(2) is the perpetrator's presence in any territory under the State party's jurisdiction. As soon as the authorities 'have reason to suspect'¹¹⁰ that a person present in their territory may be responsible for acts subject to the obligation to extradite or prosecute, they are immediately obliged to start an investigation. At the latest, this point is reached when the authorities receive a pertaining complaint.¹¹¹ However, this does not imply that the complainants have to provide conclusive evidence for the alleged perpetrator's guilt or for his or her precise whereabouts. It is incumbent on the competent authorities to establish these as part of their investigation.

3.4.3.2 'Any territory under its jurisdiction'

116 The broad formulation 'present in any territory under its jurisdiction' in Article 5(2) makes clear that the obligation to exercise universal jurisdiction also extends to territory under military occupation or similar de jure or de facto control. The formulation has to be read as permissive as in Article 2¹¹² or 5(1)¹¹³ and interpreted in General Comment No 2.¹¹⁴ It therefore extends beyond the State party's land and sea territory and includes all areas over which it exercises de jure or de facto effective control. States parties, like the United States or the United Kingdom at one point in Iraq and Afghanistan, which exercise de facto control over areas outside of their national territory are therefore also required to establish and exercise jurisdiction over alleged torturers who are present in these areas. This obligation arises even if neither the alleged perpetrator (Article 5(1)(b)) nor the alleged victim (Article 5(1)(c)) are nationals of the controlled territory (eg Afghanistan, Iraq) and the crime was committed outside of it (Article 5(1)(a)).

3.4.3.3 Irrelevance of purpose and duration of suspect's presence

117 For the purpose of Article 5(2), the questions why and for how long an alleged torturer has been present on the territory of a State party is irrelevant. He or she might reside in the forum State as in the Habré case (Senegal),¹¹⁵ might come temporarily for the purpose of medical treatment, as in the cases of Pinochet (United Kingdom),¹¹⁶ Almatov (Germany),¹¹⁷ and al-Duri (Austria),¹¹⁸ in the context of bilateral military cooperation, as in the case of Ould Dah (France),¹¹⁹ for seeking asylum, as in the Zardad case (United Kingdom),¹²⁰ or for any other private or professional reason. Also an official invitation to attend a conference or a similar event, as in the HBA et al v Canada case,¹²¹ does not relieve the authorities from their obligation to exercise universal jurisdiction. Similarly, there is also nothing in the Convention that would justify narrowing the scope of the presence requirement to the 'voluntary presence' of the alleged perpetrator on the State party's territory. Such a qualification would exclude the jurisdiction over those cases in which an alleged torturer is present in the forum State, for example due to his or her extradition in a criminal matter unrelated to torture. Nevertheless, although there is nothing in the Convention's text which would lend itself for an interpretation allowing a different treatment of different durations or purposes of presence, States parties repeatedly invoked an erroneous differentiation which risks torturers enjoying impunity.

118 The issue of the scope of the presence requirement was taken up by the Committee against Torture in its consideration of France's fourth to sixth periodic reports in April 2010. The Committee recognized the provision of universal jurisdiction under the French Criminal Procedure Code, but criticized that a pending bill which aimed at adopting French legislation to the Rome Statute would also result in a restriction of the presence requirement to 'normally resident' in France. Consequently, the prosecution of alleged torturers, as in the case of Ely Ould Dah,¹²² who are only temporarily present on French territory would no longer be possible. In the concluding observations the Committee therefore recommended that the ‘normal residency’ requirement be replaced by a provision simply demanding the presence in the territory under France’s jurisdiction.¹²³

119 Similarly, the Committee took issue in its concluding observations of Canada’s sixth periodic report with the State party’s practice of exercising universal jurisdiction. In particular, the Committee was critical of Canada’s apparent policy under immigration procedures to remove or expel alleged perpetrators of torture from its territory rather than subjecting them to the criminal process as required under the Convention against Torture. According to reports submitted to the Committee, numerous foreign individuals who were accused of being responsible for torture, were not prosecuted in Canada, but expelled what resulted in the alleged torturers evading prosecution. Consequently, the Committee recommended Canada to exercise universal jurisdiction also over foreign perpetrators who are ‘temporarily present’ and requested the State party to ‘ensure that the “no safe haven” policy prioritizes criminal or extradition proceedings over deportation and removal under immigration processes’.¹²⁴

120 In stark contrast to the alleged Canadian practice of removing rather than investigating aliens who are suspected of torture is the UK’s prosecution of Faryadi Sarwar Zardad. Zardad, an Afghan citizen, was a warlord and running a checkpoint between Jalalabad and Kabul from 1991 to 1996 at which travellers were frequently abducted and subjected to torture and other forms of ill-treatment. After moving to the UK in 1998 to seek asylum, his crimes came to light in the British media. Attorney General Lord Goldsmith announced that Britain had decided to try the case on the basis that Zardad’s crimes were so ‘merciless’ and such ‘an affront to justice’ that they should be tried in any country.¹²⁵ Following the House of Lords’ judgment in the Pinochet case¹²⁶ that torture is a crime of universal jurisdiction, the Court considered Zardad’s crimes and decided them to be within the temporal jurisdiction of the Criminal Justice Act of 1988.¹²⁷ Since the United Kingdom was obliged under the Convention either to extradite or prosecute, and since no request for extradition had been received from the Afghan authorities or any other State party with jurisdiction over the case under Article 5(1), it fell to the United Kingdom to investigate the case and, if the test for prosecution was met, to prosecute Zardad. He was charged under Section 134 of the Criminal Justice Act which incorporates the Convention against Torture into British law.¹²⁸ Eventually in 2005, after a jury was not able to reach a verdict in a first trial,¹²⁹ Zardad was found guilty in a second trial

¹²⁷ Subsequent to the UK ratification of the CAT, torture as an international crime was introduced in section 134 of the Criminal Justice Act in 1988, which states that a public official or person acting in an official capacity, whatever his or her nationality, commits the offence of torture if in the United Kingdom or elsewhere he or she intentionally inflicts severe pain or suffering on another person in the performance or purported performance of official duties.

¹²⁸ See also Kaleck (n 1) 941.

¹²⁹ Zardad was first brought to trial in 2004. One of the key legal challenges of the case was to show that, although Zardad did not necessarily administer torture himself, he was still responsible through the men he controlled at his military-style checkpoints. Relying on, inter alia, the decision of the CAT Committee in of torture and of hostage taking between 1991 and 1996 and sentenced to twenty years of imprisonment. In February 2007, the Court dismissed Zardad's appeal.¹³⁰

121 Zardad's prosecution was the first successful case under universal jurisdiction laws in the United Kingdom for torture committed abroad and occurred more than five years after the conclusion of the proceedings in relation to General Pinochet. The case is a compelling demonstration of the judicial as well as logistical challenges entailed in the exercise of universal jurisdiction, including the importance of mutual judicial assistance as stipulated in Article 9.¹³¹

3.4.3.4 Timing of Presence

3.4.3.4.1 Lack of Specification in Text of Article 5(2)

122 While it is clear that it is irrelevant for the scope of Article 5(2) why an alleged perpetrator is present on the State party's territory, the answer is less straightforward when it comes to the question when exactly the presence requirement has to be fulfilled. The wording of Article 5(2) refers only in general terms to 'cases where the alleged offender is present' and hence leaves it open at what stage of the proceedings (eg filing of the complaint, arrest, trial) the alleged offender actually has to be present. Drawing on the travaux préparatoires to clarify the issue in light of the drafters' discussion does also not yield any clarification since no pertaining deliberations are included. Furthermore, the Committee's concluding observations or its decisions on individual complaints do not conclusively clarify this aspect. Analysing national case law further reveals a heterogeneous practice with States parties demanding the presence requirement to be fulfilled at different stages of the proceedings.

3.4.3.4.2 No Presence at Moment of Complaint Leads To Non-Prosecution

123 Most commonly, States parties require the presence of the alleged torturer on the territory under their jurisdiction at the moment when the pertaining complaint is filed with their authorities. Should the alleged torturer not be present, States parties argue to lack jurisdiction in order to open an investigation.

3.4.3.4.2.1 Bouterse Case (Netherlands)

124 A case in point is the futile attempt to prosecute the former Suriname military ruler Lt. Col. Bouterse under universal jurisdiction in the Netherlands. The case concerned the fate of fifteen political opponents who were allegedly tortured and killed on Lt. Col. Bouterse's order in Suriname in December 1982 ('December killings'). Out of the fifteen victims, at least one was citizen of the Netherlands. In 1996, the relatives of the Dutch victim filed a complaint with the Dutch authorities demanding an investigation into the criminal responsibility of Mr. Bouterse. This initial request was rejected by the prosecutor and the plaintiffs appealed against this decision at Amsterdam's District Court

Elmi v Australia (UN Doc CAT/C/22/D/120/1998), the ICTY case of Furundzija, and the US case of Kadic v Karadzic, the first judgment of 7 April 2004 confirmed that although Zardad was not a de jure public official, he was to be treated as a public official on a de facto basis. However, after a week of deliberations, the jury did not arrive at a verdict and the judge decided to defer the case to a later date. On 8 June 2005, the retrial of the case against Zardad took place before the Old Bailey Criminal Court in London and the prosecutor announced new evidence that was not available to the first jury.

(Gerechtshof Amsterdam).¹³² After seeking external expert advice, the Court concluded in 2000 that the case should be prosecuted under universal jurisdiction on the basis of the Dutch Act Implementing the UN Torture Convention. The prosecution was considered permissible, inter alia, due to the low prospect of a meaningful prosecution in Suriname, the possibility of the 'retrospective' application of the Convention on crimes committed in 1982, and since 'the Court has found insufficient grounds in the report of the expert for the view that prosecution of Bouterse in this country [the Netherlands] would be impermissible under international (customary) law as long as he is not present in the Netherlands'.¹³³ In consequence, the Court ordered the Prosecutor to initiate a prosecution of Bouterse under what amounted to universal jurisdiction in absentia.

125 However, in 2001, the Dutch Supreme Court (Hoge Raad), following an appeal by the Procurator-General, overturned the much debated decision of the Appeals Court on several grounds, including that prosecutions on the basis of universal jurisdiction would be only possible 'when the suspect is present in the Netherlands at the time of his arrest'.¹³⁴ According to the Supreme Court, an extradition request addressed to the Suriname authorities and (hypothetical) subsequent extradition to the Netherlands would be not permissible to bring Bouterse under Dutch jurisdiction as foreseen in the Dutch Act Implementing the Convention Against Torture.¹³⁵

126 Similar to the ruling in the Dutch Bouterse case, the Danish Public Prosecutor decided not to open an investigation into the alleged crimes of General Pinochet following a complaint submitted by Chilean exiles living in Denmark.¹³⁶ The complaint, filed in 1998 while Pinochet was under house arrest in the United Kingdom, sought to achieve Pinochet's extradition to Denmark and prosecution for his alleged responsibility for torture and other crimes. The Public Prosecutor justified the inadmissibility decision for the complaint by a lack of jurisdiction over the case due to the absence of the alleged offender on Danish territory. Furthermore, and similarly to the reasoning put forward in the Dutch Bouterse case, the Public Prosecutor argued that according to national law, the suspect must be on Danish territory, and hence an extradition of Pinochet from the United Kingdom to Denmark would bring Pinochet not under the relevant Danish

jurisdiction. Otherwise, the Prosecutor argued, 'there would be no limit on Danish jurisdiction over crimes that are subject of an international convention'.¹³⁷ Similarly, efforts to prosecute Jorge Zorreguieta, Argentina's former minister of agriculture and member of its military junta, came to an end in 2001 when the Amsterdam Court ruled on a complaint alleging his responsibility for crimes against humanity and torture. Referring to the Dutch Supreme Court's decision in the Bouterse case, the Court dismissed the complaint as inadmissible due to the lack of presence of Zorreguieta in the Netherlands.¹³⁸

3.4.3.4.2.2 'Affair Javor' (France)

127 A similar line of reasoning was also put forward by a French Court when deciding in the 'Affair Javor' that the case was inadmissible since the alleged perpetrators were not present on French territory at the time when the complaint was filed. In 1993, Elvir Javor and three other men submitted a complaint before the examining magistrate of Paris against an undisclosed person or persons, who they alleged had been responsible for acts of war crimes, crimes against humanity, genocide, and torture as part of the ethnic cleansing campaigns in Bosnia and Herzegovina in the early 1990s. The plaintiffs, who all fled from Bosnia and Herzegovina to France during the war, alleged to be victims of these acts. Although the accused named in the complaint were not present in France at the time of the filing of the complaint, an examining judge initially declared the complaint to be admissible on the basis of the Geneva Conventions as well as the Convention against Torture.¹³⁹ Following the appeal by the prosecutor to the Appeals Court (Cour d'appel), the case was however dismissed, with the Court arguing that universal jurisdiction as stipulated in Articles 689-1 and 689-2 of the French Criminal Procedure Code requires the presence of the alleged perpetrator on French territory. Hence, in the present case, France was lacking jurisdiction to consider the complaint. The inadmissibility decision was eventually also confirmed by the Court of Cassation (Cour de cassation) which argued that the mere presence of torture victims on French territory is not sufficient to commence investigations under French law. According to the ruling complaints may always be filed, however they do not trigger investigations or the opening of trials, if the suspect cannot be found on French territory.¹⁴⁰

128 Similar to the denial of initiating a prosecution in the Javor case, the French authorities also denied having jurisdiction in relation to complaints filed against Jean Claude Duvalier, the former President of Haiti.¹⁴¹ Duvalier was alleged to be responsible for the murder and torturing of tens of thousands of Haitians during his and his father's rule before fleeing to France in 1986. In 1999, four Haitians who alleged to have been imprisoned and tortured during Duvalier's rule and later moved to France, submitted a complaint with the Paris Prosecutor's Office in which they accused Duvalier of crimes against humanity. Eventually, the complaints were rejected, inter alia, on the grounds that Article 6891-1 of the French Code of Criminal Procedure, which provides for universal jurisdiction, requires the presence of the suspect on the French territory when the complaint is filed. Reportedly, the French Ministry of the Interior stated in December 1998 that it had lost track of Duvalier and that he had probably left French territory.¹⁴²

3.4.3.4.3 Continuation of Prosecution in Cases When Suspect Absconds

129 There are also cases in which the alleged torturer was present in the State party's territory at one point after a complaint was filed, however, eventually succeeded to abscond. While it is clear that the State party had jurisdiction over the case under Article 5(2) as long as the suspect had been on its territory, the question arises whether States parties continue to have jurisdiction also after the suspect has left, or whether they require his or her return to their territory for a continuation of the proceedings.

3.4.3.4.3.1 Ely Ould Dah Case (France)

130 In 2002, the French Court of Cassation (Court de cassation) decided in the case Ely Ould Dah that the State party could continue to prosecute and eventually even try the suspect, after he had fled France following his release from police custody.¹⁴³

131 Ely Ould Dah, a Mauritanian army commander, participated in a military training in France in 1999 when two Mauritanian exiles in France filed a complaint accusing him of torture allegedly perpetrated in 1990 and 1991. The fact that Mr. Ould Dah was not a resident, but merely visiting France as part of a military training is irrelevant for the scope of Article 5(2) and the related obligations under Article 6 and 7. According to Article 6(1), France exercised its jurisdiction over the case and took Mr. Ould Dah into custody after being satisfied by the examination of the available information regarding his alleged responsibility for torture. Following his appeal, Mr. Ould Dah was released on the basis of a contrôle judiciaire entailing the confiscation of his passport and house arrest. While Article 6(1) in principle provides States parties with the possibility to ensure the presence of the suspect with other legal and less intrusive means than custody, Ould Dah's release from custody resulted in his escape and return to Mauritania in April 2000.

132 While continuing to pursue Mr. Ould Dah's arrest and extradition, the French authorities also continued with his domestic prosecution and initiated trial proceedings on the basis of universal jurisdiction. Mr. Ould Dah's legal team challenged his prosecution, arguing that it would constitute a retroactive application of French law¹⁴⁴ as well ¹⁴⁴ The crimes were alleged to be committed in 1990 and 1991. France introduced only in 1994 substantive provisions into its domestic legal framework criminalizing torture (Art 222-1 Criminal Code). However, France had ratified CAT in 1986. Furthermore, Arts 689-1 and 689-2 of the Code of Criminal Procedure had already been introduced into the Code of Criminal Procedure in 1985 and provided French courts with jurisdiction to prosecute and try anyone in France who committed torture outside French territory. Article 689-2 refers explicitly to the definition in Art 1 of the Convention.

as a violation of the non bis in idem principle since Mauritania had previously passed an amnesty covering Mr. Ould Dah's alleged crimes.¹⁴⁵ In October 2002, the Court of Cassation (Court de cassation) confirmed the Appeals Court's reasoning, including the permissibility of the prosecution ratione temporis as well as its decision to consider itself not bound by the Mauritanian amnesty. Importantly, the Court of Cassation assigned the case to a lower court, the Assize Court of Nîmes (Cour d'assises), in order to try Mr. Ould Dah in absentia.¹⁴⁶ Eventually, in 2005, Mr. Ould Dah received the maximum sentence of ten years of imprisonment. The case's judgment was the first time that a French court had applied universal jurisdiction without the accused being present during the trial. In the context of the case, the satisfaction of the presence requirement at the beginning of the proceedings, when Mr. Ould Dah was present in France, was sufficient for the French authorities to justify the continuation of the proceedings into the trial phase even after his flight to Mauritania. The continuous participation of Mr. Ould Dah's legal representatives in the proceedings also attenuated concerns regarding the permissibility of a criminal trial in absentia. Mr. Ould Dahl challenged his conviction before the European Court of Human Rights. His application was however declared inadmissible.¹⁴⁷

3.4.3.4.3.2 'Congo Beach' Case (France)

133 Another French case which is instructive in relation to the timing of the presence requirement under universal jurisdiction is the so-called 'Congo Beach' case.¹⁴⁸ The case pertains to more than 350 young men who had fled from the Republic of Congo to the DRC and disappeared soon after their UN facilitated repatriation back to Congo at the river port, known as 'the Beach', in 1999.

134 More than ten years later, in December 2001, human rights organizations filed a criminal complaint at the Tribunal de Grande Instance of Paris in which they accused numerous high ranking Congolese officials, including Congo's Minister of Interior, to be criminally responsible for the men's enforced disappearance, torture, and crimes against humanity.¹⁴⁹ The complaint was based on Articles 689-1 and 689-2 of the Code of Criminal Procedure in relation to torture and Article 212-1 of the Criminal Code for Crimes against Humanity. Out of the alleged perpetrators, only one, Norbert Dabira, Inspector-General of the Congolese Armed Forces in 1990, was present in France at the time when the complaint was filed. Following his questioning by the French authorities, Dabira was placed under judicial examination, however, he was nevertheless able to return to Congo.

¹⁴⁹ The complaint was filed by OCHD (Observatoire congolais des droits de l'homme), the association of relatives of victims and supported by the International Federation of Human Rights Leagues (FIDH) and the French League of Human Rights. The alleged perpetrators included, but were not limited to, Denis Sassou Nguessou (President of the Republic of Congo), General Pierre Oba (Interior Minister), Norbert Dabira (Inspector-General of the Army), and Blaise Adoua (Commander of the Republican Guard) and any other individuals having Congolese nationality that the investigation might reveal. The case was transferred in February 2002 to the High Court of Meaux where Inspector-General Dabira owned a residence.

135 The developments in France caused the Republic of Congo to file an application with the ICJ in December 2002, in which it sought the annulment of the investigation and prosecution measures undertaken by the French authorities.¹⁵⁰ Congo accused France that by attributing to itself universal jurisdiction in criminal matters and by arrogating to itself the power to prosecute and try the Minister of the Interior of a foreign State for crimes allegedly committed by him in connection with the exercise of his powers for the maintenance of public order in his country . . .

it violated 'the principle that a State may not, in breach of the principle of sovereign equality among all Members of the United Nations . . . exercise its authority on the territory of another State'.¹⁵¹

136 In addition, Congo sought from the ICJ the indication of provisional measures 'for the immediate suspension of the proceedings conducted by the investigative judge' since these would cause irreparable prejudice regarding Congo's image and amicable relations.¹⁵² In its June 2003 decision on Certain Criminal Proceedings in France (Republic of the Congo v France),¹⁵³ however, the ICJ found no risk of irreparable prejudice and therefore rejected Congo's request for a provisional measure. In the same decision, the ICJ also rejected Congo's allegation that France's unilateral assumption of universal jurisdiction would constitute a violation of a principle of international law.¹⁵⁴

137 Following the ICJ's ruling on interim measures, the French Court issued in early 2004 an international arrest warrant against General Dabira. In April 2004, in a separate development in the case, the French authorities arrested the Congolese police chief Jean-François Ndengue who had also been named in the 2001 complaint, during a visit to Paris, charged him with crimes against humanity and took him into custody. Following an appeal by the prosecutor already on the next day—and what human rights organizations had described as the result of political interference¹⁵⁵—the decision to arrest Ndengue was quashed by the Court of Appeals, his release was ordered and all investigatory acts were declared as annulled.

138 Furthermore, in November 2004, the Court of Appeals also annulled the proceedings in relation to all other suspects named in the 'Congo Beach' complaint of 2001, arguing that the complaint was 'too general' to provide the basis for the application of universal jurisdiction and that 'universal jurisdiction in absentia was not allowed under French law'.¹⁵⁶

¹⁵⁶ Article 689-1 of the Code of Criminal Procedure reads as '(1) Perpetrators of or accomplices to offences committed outside the territory of the Republic may be prosecuted and tried by French courts either when

For the State to initiate any step, including investigations, the presence of the suspect in France would be a precondition.

139 This reading of the presence requirement by the Court of Appeals was appealed by human rights organizations which had originally submitted the complaint. About two years later, in January 2007, the Court of Cassation (Cour de cassation) lifted the entire decision of the Court of Appeals, assigned the case to a new court and ordered it to resume jurisdiction of the case, which led to a reopening of the investigation.¹⁵⁷ Since then General Dabira made at least three requests with the Court of Cassation, the investigative judge at the Court of Meaux as well as the Paris Appeals Court¹⁵⁸ to end the proceedings against him, arguing that he should not be investigated for a case which has in his opinion already been conclusively settled in a previous trial in Brazzaville in 2004. These requests have however always been rejected.

140 Both French cases, the case against Ely Ould Dah as well as the so-called 'Congo Beach' case, demonstrate how proceedings under universal jurisdiction can continue even after a suspect, who was at one point present, is outside the State party's territory. As outlined above, different States parties answer differently the question when the presence requirement stipulated in the Convention's universal jurisdiction provision has to be fulfilled. While some States require the alleged perpetrator to be present from the outset of any proceedings and otherwise deny jurisdiction, ie, Netherlands (Bouterse case) or France ('Affair Javor', Duvalier case), others are satisfied with the suspect's presence as late as the start of the trial, ie, Spain (Pinochet case).¹⁵⁹ In the Ely Ould Dah case the authorities considered the suspect's presence at the moment of the initiation of the investigation as sufficient to put him on trial even after he had left the State party's territory. On the one hand, and from a pure prosecutorial point of view, the later the presence requirement has to be fulfilled the easier it becomes for the State party to initiate proceedings under universal jurisdiction and hence to pursue the objective to end impunity. Conditioning the initiation of an investigation on the presence of the alleged perpetrator, eg even if it is known in advance that the suspect is about to travel to the State party, can seem as unnecessarily restrictive and as hampering to those cases in which the alleged perpetrator is only briefly in the forum State. On the other hand, while the State party is in principle free to regulate the precise timing of the fulfilment of the presence requirement in its domestic legal framework, it has to do so within the boundaries provided by international fair trial standards.¹⁶⁰ States parties have to ensure that a permissive presence requirement does not result in a violation of the rights of the alleged offender. As an answer to this balancing act, Berg suggests, that it should be sufficient to establish the presence of the alleged offender in the course of the investigation, latest at trial. This reading would guarantee the rights of the alleged torturer and, at the same time, contribute to the very purpose of the Convention against Torture, namely to reduce safe havens for torturers and strengthen the prohibition of torture.¹⁶¹

French law is applicable under the provision of Book I of the Criminal Code or any other statute, or when an international Convention gives jurisdiction to French courts to deal with the offence. (2) For the implementation of the Convention against Torture and other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, adopted in New York on 10th December 1984, any person guilty of torture in the sense of Article 1 of the Convention may be prosecuted and tried in accordance with the provisions of Article 689-1.' 3.4.3.4.4 Permissibility of Investigation Despite Absence of Alleged Torturer

141 Some States parties to the Convention require the fulfilment of the presence requirement for universal jurisdiction only at a later stage of the proceedings. Accordingly, the filing of a complaint and the opening of formal proceedings including an investigation becomes possible despite the absence of the alleged perpetrator. The most prominent example in this regard is likely to be the Spanish case seeking the extradition of General Pinochet from the United Kingdom. Both, the initiation of an investigation as well as the arrest warrant of 1998 were possible under Spanish law despite the absence of Pinochet on Spanish territory. However, in order to start trial proceedings before a Spanish Court, Pinochet's extradition from the UK to Spain would have to be implemented.¹⁶² Similarly, in the Bouterse case the Dutch Supreme Court concluded that Dutch courts would lack jurisdiction to prosecute the former Suriname leader as long as he is not present in the Netherlands. Remarkably though, the Supreme Court also acknowledged that the Dutch authorities were nevertheless entitled to start 'preparatory investigations' prior to this presence.¹⁶³

3.4.3.5 Universal Jurisdiction in absentia

142 Under the Convention, Article 5(2) is the only form of jurisdiction requiring the presence of the alleged perpetrator on the territory of the State party. Neither the territoriality principle nor the different forms of the nationality principles under Article 5(1) stipulate such a condition. The presence requirement under Article 5(2) of the Convention provides for a form of universal jurisdiction which is distinct from what has sometimes been called 'super pure universal jurisdiction'.¹⁶⁴ Some States, eg Belgium prior to the legislative amendments in 2003,¹⁶⁵ established jurisdiction over torture offences even if the alleged perpetrator was not present in the State party's territory and no other link providing for a jurisdiction under the territoriality or nationality principle was available. Hence, the application of 'super pure' universal jurisdiction has to be distinguished from the above outlined instances in which a suspect was present at one point on the territory of a State party which started to exercise its jurisdiction under Article 5(2) and continued to do so even after the alleged torturer absconded.

143 While the purpose of Article 5(2) is to contribute to the elimination of safe havens for torturers, there is nothing in the Convention what would lend itself to a reading that States parties are under an obligation to establish a universal jurisdiction which does not require the presence of the alleged perpetrator, aside of the jurisdictions required under the territoriality and nationality principles. At the same time though, there is also nothing in the Convention which would bar States parties to establish in their internal legal framework other forms of jurisdictions which go beyond those required by the Convention. This is made clear by Article 5(3) which explicitly states that the Convention 'does not exclude any criminal jurisdiction exercised in accordance with internal law'.

144 In light of the extraterritorial application of national laws to cases without any link to the forum State, it is not surprising that universal jurisdiction in absentia has been repeatedly challenged, particularly by States whose officials had been investigated or prosecuted under this type of jurisdiction. Partly overlapping with the objections voiced towards the passive nationality principle, universal jurisdiction in absentia has been frequently criticized as being incompatible with the equality and sovereignty of States and posing a challenge to the stability of international relations.

3.4.3.5.1 Arrest Warrant Case (Belgium)

145 The permissibility of universal jurisdiction without the presence of the alleged perpetrator ('universal jurisdiction in absentia') was initially also raised in the so-called 'Arrest Warrant Case' before the ICJ in 2000.¹⁶⁶ At the centre of the dispute between the Democratic Republic of Congo (DRC) and Belgium was the permissibility under international law of an arrest warrant issued in 2000 by a Belgium investigative judge against the then incumbent Minister of Foreign Affairs of the DRC, Mr. Abdulaye Yerodia Ndombasi. In the arrest warrant the Minister was accused of grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions and crimes against humanity. The underlying Belgium law from 1993 provided for the prosecution of these crimes irrespective of the place of the crime, the presence, and the nationality of the alleged perpetrator and victim.¹⁶⁷ With the alleged crimes perpetrated in the DRC and the alleged perpetrator and victims with no links to Belgium, the DRC initially challenged the permissible extent of the arrest warrant under national universal jurisdiction. In addition, as a subsidiary argument, the DRC claimed absolute immunity from criminal prosecution for the State's incumbent Minister of Foreign Affairs. Belgium, on the other hand, defended its jurisdiction with references to international customary law and the Permanent Court of International Justice's ruling in the landmark Lotus case of 1927.¹⁶⁸

146 Eventually though, since the DRC dropped the claim of excessive jurisdiction in its final submission to the Court, the ICJ limited its ruling to the question of immunity and missed 'a golden opportunity to cast light on a difficult and topical legal issue'.¹⁶⁹ The ICJ confirmed in its judgement in 2002 the DRC's claim to immunity for its Foreign Minister, but did not pronounce any judgment on the permissibility of universal jurisdiction in the absence of the alleged perpetrator under international law, nor on the permissibility of Belgium's legal basis for the arrest warrant.¹⁷⁰ In response to the ICJ's verdict on the Minister's immunity, Belgium withdrew the arrest warrant. Two years after the ICJ's judgment a Belgium pre-trial Appeals Court concluded that the arrest warrant against the DRC's officials was inadmissible even on domestic grounds since Belgian law would in fact have required the presence of the suspect due to requirements of domestic law.¹⁷¹ This ruling further restricted the application of Belgium's universal jurisdiction under the War Crimes Act to cases, where the suspect has to be voluntarily present on Belgian territory.¹⁷²

147 Notwithstanding the eventually reduced scope of the Court's decision, the judgment revealed diverging opinions among the ICJ's judges on the permissibility of universal jurisdiction in absentia. On the one hand, some of the judges tended to consider Belgium's legal framework providing for universal jurisdiction in absentia as incompatible with modern international law.¹⁷³ Allowing for universal jurisdiction in absentia, so parts of the underlying reasoning, would have far-reaching ramifications for the sovereignty of States, risks undermining the system of international relations and causing 'judicial chaos'.¹⁷⁴ On the other hand, some judges argued that 'there is ... nothing in [the] case law which evidences an opinio juris on the illegality of such a jurisdiction. In short, national legislation and case law—that is, State practice—is neutral as to the exercise of universal jurisdiction'.¹⁷⁵ Hence, since there is nothing in international customary law that would constitute a prohibition, States are free to extend their criminal jurisdiction, even as far as universal jurisdiction in absentia.¹⁷⁶

3.4.3.5.2 Habré Case

148 The permissibility of universal jurisdiction in the absence of the alleged perpetrator became also a critical issue in the context of attempts in Belgium to prosecute Hissène Habré for the crimes committed during his authoritarian rule in Chad.¹⁷⁷ In June 2002, a Belgian Appeals Court decided in a case dealing with the prosecution of Israel's Ariel Sharon¹⁷⁸ that Belgian universal jurisdiction¹⁷⁹ could only be invoked if the alleged perpetrator was present on the State's territory. In light of Habré's residence in Senegal, the pertaining investigation in Belgium came to a halt.

149 In February 2003, the Belgian Court of Cassation (Cour de cassation) dismissed the case against Sharon arguing that he would enjoy immunity from criminal prosecution due to his position as Prime Minister. However, the Court of Cassation also reversed the Appeals Court's previous ruling and concluded that Belgian law would provide for universal jurisdiction in absentia. Accordingly, the Court concluded that Belgian law would not require the presence of the accused on Belgian territory at the moment of the initiation of criminal proceedings in relation to genocide, crimes against humanity, ¹⁷² Relating to this point it was criticized that '[t]he court based itself on a provision in the domestic code of penal procedure; it did not consider international law. As for the timing of the decision, it is bizarre for a country to issue an international arrest warrant and insist on its international legality before the ICJ, only to have a domestic court decide two years later that the warrant contravenes municipal law. The ruling also implies that the proceedings against Pinochet were ill-founded under domestic law': Reydams, Universal Jurisdiction (n 1), 116ff; see also Berg (n 1) fn 794.

¹⁷⁹ The domestic legislation in question was Belgium's 1993 law on the punishment of serious violations of international law as well as the pertaining amendment of 1999. See Reydams, Universal Jurisdiction (n 1) 117. grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions, and war crimes.¹⁸⁰ As a political backlash to these judicial developments and new complaints against US President Bush at Belgian courts looming, Belgian lawmakers undertook comprehensive reforms of the domestic legal framework, effectively ending universal jurisdiction in absentia, with the exception of a few cases under a transition clause. This clause allowed for the continuation of pending cases inter alia if a civil petitioner to a case had Belgian citizenship prior to the reform's entry into force. Since three plaintiffs in the Habré case had obtained Belgium citizenship, the Belgian authorities were able to resume their investigation.

150 Eventually, in September 2005, the Belgian investigative judge charged Habré with genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes, torture and other serious violations of international humanitarian law, issued an international arrest warrant as well as an extradition request which was inter alia based on the Convention against Torture. The 2003 amendments to Belgium's legal framework, however, effectively meant that the Belgian prosecution of Hissène Habré was no longer a prosecution under universal jurisdiction, but under the passive nationality principle.

3.4.4 Competing Claims to Jurisdiction

151 The jurisdictions required under Article 5(1) and (2) are not mutually exclusive, but can be overlapping. If torture, for example, was perpetrated in State A and the alleged perpetrator flees to State B, both States have jurisdiction over the case. State A as the territorial State is required to have established jurisdiction under the territorial principle as stipulated under Article 5(1)(a). State B is required to have established universal jurisdiction under Article 5(2) covering the presence of the alleged perpetrator on its territory.

3.4.4.1 No Legal Hierarchy

152 Although there were suggestions during the drafting of the Convention that jurisdiction under the territoriality principle should have priority over other forms, the final text of the Convention does not endorse a formal ranking among the jurisdictions provided in Article 5.¹⁸¹ Instructively, Article 7 of the 1970 Hague Hijacking Convention which provided the template for the formulation of Article 5 during the Torture Convention's drafting process does also not feature any ranking between the different types of jurisdiction.¹⁸²

153 Hence, the State party, on whose territory the alleged perpetrator is present, is free to exercise its jurisdiction over the case, if it 'does not extradite him pursuant to article 8 to any of the States mentioned in paragraph 1'¹⁸³ of Article 5. Universal jurisdiction under Article 5(2) is not subsidiary to other forms of jurisdiction as provided in Article 5(1). The State where the alleged torturer is present is therefore under no legal obligation to extradite, but is obliged to prosecute unless it opts for extradition according to the principle 'aut detere aut judicare' as stipulated in Article 7.

154 A precondition for extradition, however, is the presence of an extradition request by another State party with jurisdiction over the case under Article 5(1). If no State requests an extradition, the State has no legal alternative other than to investigate thoroughly the allegations of torture and, if the evidence is considered to be sufficient, to prosecute the person concerned before its domestic criminal courts. Furthermore, should the forum State receive an extradition request, it still has to ensure that any extradition it may opt for does not contravene the very purpose of the Convention which is to make the fight against torture more effective and hold its perpetrators accountable. This concerns particularly the State party's obligation not to facilitate impunity by extraditing the suspect to a safe haven as well as its obligation to respect the non-refoulement principle as stipulated in Article 3 of the Convention.

155 If there are any indications that the State which requested extradition has done so for the purpose of shielding the alleged torturer against effective prosecution ('safe haven'), such an extradition request shall not be met and the alleged torturer shall, in the absence of other extradition requests, be prosecuted under the universal jurisdiction principle by the forum State. Similarly, should there be arguments leading to the conclusion that the State requesting extradition de facto does not dispose over a judicial system which is effectively able to conduct a prosecution in accordance with international criminal and human rights law, the forum State shall refrain from extraditing the alleged torturer to this State, but prosecute under its own universal jurisdiction or extradite—if requested—to another State which is not only willing but also capable to effectively exercise its jurisdiction under Article 5(1).

3.4.4.2 Hierarchy of Jurisdictions due to Practical Considerations

156 While there are no formal grounds in the Convention which would stipulate a ranking between the different heads of jurisdiction, practical considerations such as the availability of evidence, the location of witnesses, different language requirements, or financial considerations can speak against the exercise of universal jurisdiction in the forum State.

3.4.4.2.1 Guatemala Genocide Case (Spain)

157 The Spanish Guatemala genocide case is an instructive example when it comes to how States parties deal with the relation between the different heads of jurisdiction under Article 5.¹⁸⁴ The case concerned 10,000s of victims of the Guatemalan civil war from 1962 to 1996 in which particularly members of the indigenous Maya population were killed by forces belonging to or de facto operating under the command of the country's military regime. In December 1999, survivors and relatives of victims, including peace Nobel Laureate Rigoberta Menchú Tum, filed a pertaining complaint in Spain, accusing former members of the Guatemalan Government, including former President Efraín Ríos Montt, of genocide together with acts of torture, terrorism, and kidnapping.¹⁸⁵

158 After an examining magistrate declared himself competent to investigate the case under universal jurisdiction, the Public Prosecutor filed an appeal which was partly upheld by the National Court (Audiencia Nacional). Importantly, while the Convention against Torture does not stipulate any ranking between universal and other jurisdictional heads, it remains at the discretion of the State party's national legislator to introduce such a hierarchy with regard to its domestic application. Accordingly, Spain's universal jurisdiction (in absentia) would be 'subsidiary' to the jurisdiction of the territorial state. Hence, only if the complainants could demonstrate that the territorial state, Guatemala, did not adequately prosecute the crime in question, Spain would be in the position to exercise universal jurisdiction. As long as this was not sufficiently 'accredited' by the complainants, the prosecution in Spain had to be stayed.¹⁸⁶ This decision by the National Court was further appealed at Spain's Supreme Court (Tribunal Supremo) which partly upheld the previous verdict in 2003. It confirmed the 'priority test' endorsed by the National Court and concluded also that universal jurisdiction could not be exercised 'without a legitimizing link with Spain, such as the presence of the offender in Spain'.¹⁸⁷ The Supreme Court, however, concluded that Spain has the competence to exercise jurisdiction for those cases whose victims were Spanish citizens and therewith allowed prosecution under the passive nationality principle.¹⁸⁸ Eventually, though, this differentiation between Spanish and non-Spanish victims was removed by Spain's Constitutional Court which concluded that the Spanish citizenship would not be required to enjoy the effective protection of the rights enshrined in the Spanish constitution.¹⁸⁹ In 2006, the Spanish authorities issued indictments as well as extradition requests to Guatemala.¹⁹⁰

3.4.4.2.2 Abu Ghraib Case (Germany)

159 The hierarchy of jurisdictions was also a pertinent issue for the effort to initiate a prosecution under universal jurisdiction in Germany in relation to the abuse of prisoners in the US-run prison Abu Ghraib in Iraq.

160 In November 2004, then US Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld, CIA director George Tenet, and others were subject of a complaint filed in Germany, in which they were accused of being responsible for the systematic torture of detainees in the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq.¹⁹¹ The German prosecutor classified the allegations as crimes against humanity and hence as violations of international humanitarian law as codified in the Code of Crimes against International Law (CCIAL, Völkerstrafgesetzbuch) and

¹⁹⁰ The extradition request was eventually declared invalid by Guatemala's Constitutional Court. Following his election to Congress in 2007 and subsequently enjoying immunity it was only in 2012 that Ríos Montt was formally indicted by the Guatemalan authorities. After a protracted process with repeated delays and interruptions, Ríos Montt was convicted for genocide and crimes against humanity in May 2013 and sentenced to eighty years of imprisonment. Only a few days after this judgement, Guatemala's Constitutional Court suspended the proceedings and ordered the trial to restart from where it stood as of 19 April. Ríos Montt died on 1 April 2018. the German Code of Criminal Procedure.¹⁹² In contrast to the German Criminal Code which would require the suspect's presence on German territory for the initiation of proceedings under universal jurisdiction, the CCAIL already allows for universal jurisdiction proceedings in cases in which the presence of the suspect can be expected.¹⁹³ While this more permissive presence requirement may increase the prospect of an investigation, the classification of the alleged torture cases as crimes against humanity implies a higher burden of proof, including the requirements of the crime to be widespread, systematic, and directed against civilians. Furthermore, and critically in the German Abu Ghraib case, the classification of torture crimes under the CCAIL also implied that universal jurisdiction became subsidiary to other heads of jurisdiction. Against this background, the German Federal Prosecutor was able to drop the case in February 2005, arguing that the US' jurisdiction under the territorial principle would have supremacy. Surprisingly, any potential reservations that leaving the case with the US authorities may result in impunity were not considered to be sufficiently substantiated in order to justify a prosecution in Germany.¹⁹⁴

3.4.5 Temporal Scope of Jurisdiction

161 In general, the obligations entailed in the jurisdictions to be established under Article 5 arise with the State becoming a party to the Convention. Consequently, only those acts which were committed after the State has ratified or acceded to the Convention fall under the jurisdiction of the State. Crimes perpetrated prior to this date are outside of the Convention's scope ratione temporis. Notwithstanding this general rule, a considerable variety exists when it comes to States' practices with some States establishing domestic legislations, which provides for an application of the Convention to acts committed prior to its ratification or accession date. Furthermore, norms such as the prohibition of torture have existed already prior to the creation of the Convention as a part of customary international law. The temporal scope of these norms reaches beyond the date at which a State became party to the Convention and binds States irrespective of the Convention's temporal scope.

3.4.5.1 OR, MM, and MS v Argentina

162 In *OR, MM, and MS v Argentina*¹⁹⁵ the complainants to the Committee against Torture were Argentinian citizens residing in Argentina, writing on behalf of deceased relatives, also Argentinian citizens, allegedly tortured to death by Argentine military authorities in 1976. They claimed that the enactment of the 'Due Obedience Act' and the 'Finality Act' amounted to violations of the Convention.

163 The 'Due Obedience Act'¹⁹⁶ presumed (without admitting proof to the contrary) that those persons who held lower military ranks at the time when the crimes were committed were acting under superior orders and therefore exempted from punishment. The immunity also covered superior military officers who did not act as commander-in-chief, chief of zone, or chief of security police or penitentiary forces, provided that they did not themselves decide or that they did not participate in the elaboration of criminal orders. Although the victims named in the complaint were allegedly tortured to death prior to the entry into force of the Convention,¹⁹⁷ the authors nonetheless challenged the compatibility of the 'Due Obedience Act' with the Convention. They also challenged the compatibility of the provision of the 'Finality Act'¹⁹⁸ which established a deadline of sixty days for commencing new criminal investigations with regard to the 'dirty war' (guerra sucia) and which expired on 22 February 1987.

164 Despite being found inadmissible ratione temporis the Committee took the opportunity to emphasize in an obiter dictum that the obligation to take effective measures to prevent torture and to punish acts of torture existed as a general rule of international law¹⁹⁹ even prior to the entry into force of the Convention. In this context, the Committee observed that it would seem that the 'Due Obedience Act' pardoned the acts of torture that occurred during the 'dirty war' and that as a result, many persons who committed acts of torture remained unpunished. The Committee further observed that Argentina was 'morally bound'²⁰⁰ to provide a remedy to the victims of torture and to their dependents, notwithstanding the fact that the acts of torture occurred before the Convention's entry into force under the responsibility of a de facto Government which was not the present Government of Argentina. Furthermore, the Committee deemed the legislation to be incompatible with the spirit and purpose of the Convention against Torture.

165 The temporal scope of the Convention's application was also raised in the Bouterse case.²⁰¹ Since the crimes which Bouterse was alleged to have perpetrated took place in 1982 and hence preceded the Netherlands' ratification of the Convention against Torture in 1988, the proceedings were challenged ratione temporis and claimed to be a retroactive application of the Convention. In 2000, however, the Amsterdam District Court rejected an appeal requesting an end of the proceedings ratione temporis. It argued that the Convention of 1986 would be 'of a declaratory nature', which only confirmed what was already customary international law at the time when the alleged crimes were committed as far as the prohibition, punishment and description of torture as a crime against humanity are concerned.²⁰² Hence, the Court argued, a 'retrospective' application

The Court of Appeals explained that 'torture as a crime against humanity was already a crime in 1982 under customary international law, and that the offender can be held personally liable under criminal law'; that 'in 1982, it was probably not the case (any more) that a crime against humanity could also be committed only in time of war or armed conflict, not in time of peace'; that 'crimes against humanity are not subject to statutory limitation'; and that 'customary international law, as it stood in 1982, gave a state competence to exercise extraterritorial (universal) jurisdiction over a person accused of a crime against humanity when that person was not a national of the state'. Furthermore, the Court agreed with the court-appointed expert, John R Dugard of the University of Leiden, that the Act 'could be applied retrospectively to cover conduct that was illegal under Dutch law before 1989 but was not criminalised of the Convention, which does not create new offences, for events which occurred prior to its ratification would be permissible. Consequently, the Amsterdam District Court did not dismiss the case ratione temporis.

166 Eventually, though in 2001, the Dutch Supreme Court overturned the previous appeals decision by arguing that the application of the Convention for crimes committed in 1982 constituted a violation of the legality principle as enshrined in the Dutch Constitution and the Criminal Code. As a result, the Supreme Court found that the Dutch Act implementing the Convention against Torture was not applicable to Bouterse's acts in 1982, since Article 16 of the Dutch Constitution prohibits retroactive application of the law. Hence, Dutch courts lacked jurisdiction over the case ratione temporis.²⁰³

3.4.5.1 Habré Case (ICJ)

167 In its 2012 decision in the Habré case, the ICJ elaborated on the temporal scope of Senegal's obligation under the Convention against Torture. Accordingly, Senegal, which had ratified the Convention in 1986, was only bound by the Convention's obligation from its entry into force in 1987 and hence only from thereon required to have established the different heads of jurisdictions stipulated in Article 5. Consequently, those crimes which were allegedly perpetrated under Habré's regime from 1982 to 1987 were outside of the temporal scope of the Convention and hence the pertaining allegations inadmissible for the ICJ. Nothing in the Convention obliged Senegal to establish jurisdictions in accordance with Article 5 which would cover the period prior to the treaty's entry into force.²⁰⁴

3.4.5.2 Pinochet Case (UK)

168 The ICJ's ruling in the Habré case also indirectly confirmed the decision of the House of Lords in the prominent 'Pinochet 3' decision in 1999. The case relating to former Chilean military ruler Augusto Pinochet and Spain's request to the United Kingdom for his extradition is certainly among the most prominent cases when it comes to the application of extraterritorial jurisdiction and highly pertinent for the delineation of the temporal scope of the Convention against Torture.²⁰⁵

169 Augusto Pinochet, who ruled Chile from the coup d'état in 1973 until 1990, travelled in 1998 to the United Kingdom in order to receive medical treatment. Based on investigations which had already been undertaken several years in advance, Spanish authorities issued an arrest warrant and demanded Pinochet to be extradited from the UK to Spain in order to put him on trial for his role in the killings of Spanish citizens in Chile in the aftermath of the coup d'état. In response, Pinochet was put under house arrest in his London hospital in October 1998. However, for the extradition request to be approved, British law required reciprocity meaning that the crime of which Pinochet was accused in Spain would have to be also a crime in the UK. Since the Spanish authorities sought to exercise their jurisdiction under the passive nationality principle for the murder of Spanish citizens outside of Spain, and British law did not provide for an equivalent passive nationality jurisdiction, the requirement of double criminality was not met. Hence, extradition was deemed not to be permissible.²⁰⁶

170 In response to the blocked avenue to seek extradition on the basis of the passive nationality principle, the Spanish authorities issued on 18 October 1998 a second arrest warrant. This warrant was based on universal jurisdiction for the crimes of genocide, terrorism, abduction, and torture and intended to overcome the jurisdictional issues which previously hampered extradition. Issuing an arrest warrant under universal jurisdiction despite Pinochet's presence in the UK was possible for the Spanish authorities since domestic law only required the presence of the alleged perpetrator on Spain's territory with the start of the trial.²⁰⁷

171 As a reaction to the second arrest warrant and the pertaining extradition request, the British Crown Prosecution Service appealed to the House of Lords asking it to pronounce its views on essentially two issues, which would eventually decide whether Pinochet could be extradited to Spain or not.

3.4.5.2.1 House of Lords Decisions

172 The first issue concerned the question whether Pinochet was immune from prosecutions, and hence should not be extradited to Spain. The second issue was whether the crimes alleged in the Spanish arrest warrant were indeed extraditable offences under UK law.²⁰⁸ As with the extradition request connected to the first arrest warrant, for the UK to extradite Pinochet to Spain it had to be established that the crimes alleged in the second arrest warrant were also crimes in the UK and hence fulfilled the requirement of 'double criminality'. The answer to the question was contingent on the temporal scope of the UK's obligation under the Convention against Torture.

173 Essentially, two lines of reasoning were put forward in order to decide on the temporal scope of the Convention. According to the first line of reasoning, double criminality was only given from 1988 onwards, when the UK became a State party to the Convention against Torture and passed its pertaining implementation law, the Criminal Justice Act. Since the Spanish arrest warrant concerned alleged crimes committed in the period from 1973 to 1990, those crimes committed prior to 1988 would fall outside of the temporal scope of the UK's obligation under the Convention. Only with the ratification of the Convention, the UK was under an obligation to establish jurisdiction in accordance with Article 5(2) over torture committed outside of its border, in this case Chile, by an alleged perpetrator who was present in the UK. Hence, only those alleged crimes committed in the period between 1988 and 1990 would satisfy the double criminality requirement and constitute extraditable offences.

174 According to the second line of reasoning, in order to approve the Spanish extradition request, double criminality would have to be satisfied only at the moment when the request was put forward, hence in 1998. Since this was the case—both Spain and the UK were States parties to the Convention in 1998 and under the obligation to have universal jurisdiction over torture—double criminality for all alleged crimes was fulfilled and extradition would be permissible. This reasoning implied that the actual date of commission of the crime was irrelevant and that the Convention could also be applied to acts committed prior to the UK joining the Convention.

175 In what would become later known as the ‘Pinochet 1’ decision, the majority of the House of Lords decided in 1998 that the requirement of double criminality would have to be satisfied only at the date of the extradition request. Since this was the case, and the Lords also decided that Pinochet would not enjoy any immunity from prosecution, his extradition to Spain would be permissible.²⁰⁹ Hence, in light of the decision of the House of Lords, the Home Office ordered in December 1998 the extradition proceedings to go ahead. However, before any extradition proceedings could be executed, the House of Lords’ decision was challenged due to allegations of bias of one of the judgments’ Lords and subsequently annulled by a decision which came to be known as ‘Pinochet 2’.²¹⁰ Consequently, the matter had to be reconsidered.

176 Contrary to the outcome in the annulled ‘Pinochet 1’ decision, in March 1999 the Lords concluded in what would become known as ‘Pinochet 3’ that for the requirement of double criminality to be satisfied, the act under consideration would have to be a crime under UK law already at the date of its commission.²¹¹ Consequently, since the UK’s universal jurisdiction for torture was only established in 1988, those acts preceding the Convention’s ratification were not extraditable crimes. Out of thirty-two crimes stated in the Spanish extradition request only one remained. Eventually though, in March 2000, the Home Office decided to order Pinochet’s release on medical grounds. Following the Spanish Foreign Ministry’s failure to forward in due time a pertaining appeal by the National Court (Audiencia Nacional)²¹² to the British authorities, Pinochet returned to Chile and was never put on trial for any of the alleged crimes put forward in the Spanish extradition request. Remarkably, the members of the House’s majority, although all arriving at the conclusion that double criminality is only given from 1988 onwards, put forward arguments which were considerably different from each other and hence did not endorse a consensus on why double criminality would be only given from 1988 onwards.²¹³

3.4.5.3 Ely Ould Dah Case (France)

177 In the French trial proceedings against Ely Ould Dah²¹⁴, the defendant's legal team challenged the legality of the case claiming a retroactive application of the 1994 law criminalizing torture in France to crimes which were allegedly committed by Mr. Ould Dah in 1990 and 1991. In 2001, the Court of Appeals (Cour d'appel) dismissed this objection arguing that since France had become a State party to the Convention against Torture in 1986 and treaty law being above domestic statute law, no retroactive application was given even if the substantive legislation was only incorporated at a later date into the French domestic legal framework. Furthermore, torture had been outlawed as an aggravating circumstance in French law prior to 1994.²¹⁵

3.5 Article 5(3): Savings Clause

178 Article 5(3) stipulates that the Convention 'does not exclude any criminal jurisdiction exercised in accordance with internal law'. The formulation, which is based on the original Swedish draft, did not give rise to any substantial discussions and had already been adopted by consensus in the Working Group in 1981. While Article 5(1) and (2) oblige States parties to establish jurisdictions on the basis of the territoriality, nationality,²¹⁶ and universal jurisdiction principle in order to close safe havens for perpetrators, Article 5(3) provides the basis for States parties to incorporate other forms of jurisdictions which are not covered by the preceding paragraphs of Article 5 into their domestic legal frameworks. By implication, Article 5(3) also clarifies that paragraphs 1 and 2 should not be read as exhaustive and are therefore not meant to constrain States parties.²¹⁷ As such, the domestic legal framework may provide for jurisdiction which goes beyond the scope of Articles 5(1) and (2), eg by stipulating universal jurisdiction in absentia, but it may not limit the Convention's jurisdictional scope by introducing additional qualifying criteria, eg by requiring the 'normal residency' of an alleged torturer on the State party's territory.

3.5.1 Pinochet (Spain)

179 An example for a national jurisdiction going beyond the requirements of the Convention is Spain's domestic legal framework in the context of the Pinochet case. In October 1998, the Spanish authorities issued an arrest warrant under the universal jurisdiction principle, although the alleged perpetrator was not present on Spain's territory. Even if one would consider the Spanish law an aberration of Article 5(2)—and being within the margin of interpretation when it comes to the timing of the presence requirement—Article 5(3) clarifies that the Convention does not bar Spain from establishing such a form of jurisdiction, provided it is in conformity with other general principles of international law.²¹⁸

3.5.2 Almatov Case (Germany)

180 In the Almatov case,²¹⁹ the United Nations Special Rapporteur on Torture as well as numerous human rights NGOs appealed to the German authorities to initiate an investigation into the alleged criminal responsibility of the Uzbek Minister of Interior for the widespread practice of torture in the country's places of detention and the Andijan massacre. While Germany would be obliged to do so under the Convention if Almatov was present on Germany's territory, Germany's Code of Crimes against International Law (CCIAL, Völkerstrafgesetzbuch) would have also empowered the German authorities to initiate such an investigation even in the absence of Almatov, provided that the acts of torture were classified as crimes against humanity. While there is nothing in the Convention which obliges Germany to initiate such an investigation in absentia, Article 5(3) makes it clear that such an investigation in absentia is not in breach of the Convention.

Article 6

Procedural Safeguards During the Preliminary Investigation Phase

Upon being satisfied, after an examination of information available to it, that the circumstances so warrant, any State Party in whose territory a person alleged to have committed any offence referred to in article 4 is present shall take him into custody or take other legal measures to ensure his presence. The custody and other legal measures shall be as provided in the law of that State but may be continued only for such time as is necessary to enable any criminal or extradition proceedings to be instituted.
2. Such State shall immediately make a preliminary inquiry into the facts.
3. Any person in custody pursuant to paragraph 1 of this article shall be assisted in communicating immediately with the nearest appropriate representative of the State of which he is a national, or, if he is a stateless person, to the representative of the State where he usually resides.
4. When a State, pursuant to this article, has taken a person into custody, it shall immediately notify the States referred to in article 5, paragraph 1, of the fact that such person is in custody and of the circumstances which warrant his detention. The State which makes the preliminary inquiry contemplated in paragraph 2 of this article shall promptly report its findings to the said States and shall indicate whether it intends to exercise jurisdiction.

1. Introduction¹

1 Articles 6 to 9 are closely linked to the obligation of States parties under Article 5 to establish jurisdiction over the offence of torture in accordance with the territoriality, flag, nationality, and universal jurisdiction principles. Although Articles 6 to 9 are particularly relevant to universal jurisdiction, these provisions in principle apply to all types of jurisdiction laid down in Article 5.

2 Most of the procedural safeguards provided for in Article 6 are fairly self-evident. If the suspected torturer is present in the territory of the State which initiates criminal proceedings (the presence is a legal requirement only for exercising universal jurisdiction under the Convention against Torture), its authorities shall take him or her into custody or take other legal measures to ensure his or her presence. The cases of *Al-Duri*² and *Almatov*³ illustrate that Governments are not always aware of their obligation to arrest any suspected torturer present in their territories or, for diplomatic or political reasons, choose not to take the measures required under international law. The *Ould Dab*⁴ case shows that non-custodial measures may not be sufficient to ensure the presence of a suspected torturer.

3 After having taken the necessary measures to ensure the presence of the suspected torturer, the criminal investigation authorities shall make a preliminary inquiry into the facts, and report the findings of such an inquiry to other States which may be interested or obliged under the Convention to exercise jurisdiction, such as the territorial State or the States of which the suspected torturer or the torture victims are nationals. The suspected torturer shall also be granted the right to communicate with consular or diplomatic representatives of his or her State. The immediate obligation to notify other States parties of any custody and inquiries serves the purposes of protecting the rights of the accused as well as of facilitating possible extradition requests in accordance with Articles 7 and 8.

5. Any person regarding whom proceedings are being carried out in connection with any of the offences referred to in Article 4 shall be guaranteed fair treatment at all stages of the proceedings.

2.2 Analysis of Working Group Discussions

7 Article 6 was inserted in the revised Swedish draft on the basis of a proposal by the United States and on informal consultations. It has no equivalent in the original Swedish draft.⁸ In written comments on Article 14 of the original Swedish draft the United States had proposed a new article, based on similar articles in the Hijacking, Sabotage and Protection of Diplomats Conventions, designed to establish procedural safeguards during the preliminary investigation phase. Article 6 would require the apprehending State to notify other concerned States of the results of its preliminary investigation, and its intention regarding prosecution or extradition, as well as guaranteeing the accused the right to communicate with the State entitled to protect his or her rights.

8 During the 1980 Working Group several delegates pointed out that the word 'preliminary' used in Article 6(2) might give the impression that the actions described in paragraph 1 had been carried out without the necessary examination.⁹ It was suggested that paragraph 2 should be incorporated into paragraph 1. Some delegates proposed the insertion of the words 'preliminary enquiry' into paragraph 1 and the substitution of the words 'further' or 'formal' for the word 'preliminary' in paragraph 2. It was agreed that the proposed phrase 'after an examination of information available to it' should be added after the word 'satisfied' in paragraph 1.

9 One view was that the phrase 'other measures', contained in paragraph 1, might be interpreted too widely. It was suggested that it be replaced by 'other legal measures'. Similarly in the French text, it was suggested that the word 'légales' be replaced by the word 'juridiques'.

10 One representative, referring to a similar paragraph in the New York Hostages Convention, proposed to extend the scope of paragraph 3 to stateless persons by adding the phrase 'or, if he is a stateless person, to the representative of the State where he usually resides' after the word 'national'.

11 It was decided that discussion on paragraph 4 would be suspended until after consideration of the question of jurisdiction in Articles 5 and 7 since there was no clear link between paragraph 4 dealing with notification to States having jurisdiction under Article 5(1) and Articles 5 and 7.

12 Article 6(1), (2), (3), and (5), as adopted by consensus by the Working Group, read as follows:

1. Upon being satisfied, after an examination of information available to it, that the circumstances so warrant, any State Party in whose territory a person alleged to have committed any offence referred to in article 4 is present, shall take him into custody or take other legal measures to ensure his presence. The custody and other legal measures shall be as provided in the law of that State but may be continued only for such time as is necessary to enable any criminal or extradition proceedings to be instituted.
2. Such State shall immediately make a preliminary enquiry into the facts.
3. Any person in custody pursuant to paragraph 1 of this article shall be assisted in communicating immediately with the nearest appropriate representative of the State of which he is a national, or, if he is a stateless person, to the representative of the State where he usually resides.
4. [When a State, pursuant to this article, has taken a person into custody, it shall immediately notify the States referred to in article 5, paragraph 1, of the fact that such person is in custody and of the circumstances which warrant his detention. The State which makes the preliminary enquiry contemplated in paragraph 2 of this article shall promptly report its findings to the said States and shall indicate whether it intends to exercise jurisdiction.]
5. Any person regarding whom proceedings are being carried out in connexion with any of the offences referred to in Article 4 shall be guaranteed fair treatment at all stages of the proceedings.

13 The 1981 Working Group examined paragraph 4.¹⁰ No decision was taken because this paragraph was connected with the question of universal jurisdiction and certain members considered that Articles 5 and 7 should be adopted first. It was decided that paragraph 5 of Article 6 should be transferred to Article 7 when the remainder of Article 7 had been adopted.¹¹ The Working Group decided to retain Article 6 as drafted and to revert to it later.

14 In 1982 the Working Group again concluded that Article 6(4) should not be considered separately from Article 7.¹² At the conclusion of the discussion on Article 7, it was noted that those delegations which could support the provisions of Article 7 could accept paragraph 4 of Article 6. The decision of the previous year's Working Group to include paragraph 5 of Article 6 in Article 7 after adoption of that article as a whole was confirmed.

15 In 1984, the Working Group eventually achieved consensus on and adopted Article 6(4) as it stood.¹³

3. Issues of Interpretation

3.1 Article 6(1): Obligation to Ensure the Presence of the Alleged Torturer

3.1.1 Examination of Information Available

16 Article 6(1) stipulates that as soon as a State party's authorities have credible information that an alleged torturer is present in its territory, they shall take him or her into custody or take other legal measures to ensure his or her presence during the preliminary phase of the investigation, which might lead to formal criminal or extradition proceedings.

¹⁰ Report of the Working Group of the Commission on Human Rights (1981) UN Doc E/CN.4/L.1576.

17 The obligation to ensure the presence of the alleged torturer arises only once the State party has been ‘satisfied, after an examination of information available to it, that the circumstances so warrant’. This introductory phrase of Article 6(1) makes clear that States parties have a ‘wide degree of freedom to assess whether or not the circumstances warrant such a measure’,¹⁴ including in their evaluation of the information submitted by eg victims, relatives, or non-governmental organizations.

18 While this discretion is meant to provide the necessary investigatory and prosecutorial flexibility required by the details of each individual case, it also risks being abused by States wishing to avoid their responsibility to exercise jurisdiction in accordance with Articles 5 and 7. By resorting to an excessive interpretation of Article 6(1) States might try to justify their decision not to investigate an alleged torturer, for example due to political considerations, by simply asserting that the information available was not credible or did not provide enough evidence to warrant an investigation. Although relevant for all jurisdictions stipulated in Article 5, the provision is particularly relevant for universal jurisdiction cases in which a few days or even only hours of delay may suffice for an alleged torturer to leave the country and hence enjoy impunity.

19 Against this background, it is important to emphasize that under Article 6(1) the information provided to the State party is merely required to raise the suspicion to a level that a further investigation by the competent authorities is warranted. The ‘information available’ to which Article 6(1) refers is not required to live up to any evidentiary standards as demanded in a criminal trial. Furthermore, when considering the available information at this stage, the State party is also not required to do so as part of a full-fledged investigation, but as part of an initial, critical analysis which is suitable to assess the allegation’s credibility and decide whether there is enough suspicion that warrants further scrutiny. Hence, under Article 6(1) the State authorities are not yet tasked to decide whether to initiate a formal criminal investigation into the case and put the alleged perpetrator in pre-trial detention. The purpose of Article 6(1) is first and foremost to ensure, if the allegations have been considered sufficiently credible, that the alleged perpetrator cannot abscond while the authorities facilitate the initiation of a preliminary investigation as required under Article 6(2) at the end of which the authorities will decide whether or not to charge the alleged perpetrator.

3.1.1.1 HBA et al v Canada

20 Although eventually ruled inadmissible, the discretion of a State party regarding its obligations under Article 6(1) was at the core of the allegations raised in the case HBA et al v Canada before the Committee against Torture in 2013.¹⁵ In 2011, the counsel of the four complainants sought to initiate the prosecution of former US President George W. Bush under universal jurisdiction at the occasion of his upcoming trip to Canada. The four men alleged to have been tortured in secret places of detention by or at the acquiescence of US officials in the context of the so-called 'war on terror'. In anticipation of Mr. Bush's visit, the men's counsel submitted a comprehensive dossier to the Attorney General of Canada and called upon him to launch a criminal investigation into the role of the former President in authorizing and overseeing the US administration's torture programme. In the absence of any reply from the Attorney General,¹⁶ the counsel attempted to initiate a private prosecution as provided under Canadian law. The responsible Justice of Peace, however, refused to receive the pertaining complaint on the grounds that Mr. Bush was at that point not yet present on Canadian territory. Eventually, two days later on 20 October 2011 and with Mr. Bush present in Canada, the counsel was able to submit the complaint seeking private prosecution. The Justice of Peace scheduled a hearing for January 2012 in order to verify the allegations, by which point Bush would already have left Canada. However, still on 20 October, the Attorney General of British Columbia used his authority to intervene in private prosecutions and directed a stay of the proceedings against Mr. Bush. The stay of the private prosecution was argued to be warranted since the required consent from the Attorney General of Canada was expected not to be granted. Consequently, Mr. Bush was able to visit Canada without ever being approached by the Canadian authorities in relation to the torture allegations.

21 Against this background, the complainants argued before the Committee that Canada had breached its obligations under Article 6(1) as well as Articles 5(2) and 7(1). Regarding Article 6(1), the complainants argued that Canada would have been required, following an examination of the information dossier provided to the authorities, to ensure the continuing presence of Mr. Bush and to initiate an investigation.¹⁷ In response, Canada argued that the obligation under Article 6(1) to take measures to ensure the continuing presence of the alleged perpetrator is not absolute, and that there may be occasions when the circumstances do not warrant ensuring the presence for the purpose of criminal proceedings.¹⁸ The decision not to arrest or to ensure the presence of Mr. Bush by non-custodial means was, according to the State party, within its investigative and prosecutorial discretion, which allows to not follow up on a complaint.¹⁹

¹⁹ ibid, para 4.3. With a view to corroborate its decision, the State party asserted that no prosecution could go forward on the basis of the information package received by the complainant's counsel, since it did not meet the evidentiary burden required to lay charges or obtain a conviction. The State party also alleged that the timing and volume of the information provided to the Attorney General would not have permitted a thorough investigation within the few weeks prior to Bush's visit to Canada. Furthermore, according to the State party, the timing was also inadequate for the Attorney General to make a properly informed decision on the necessary consent in relation to the intended private prosecution (ibid, para 4.7.). With regard to its obligation to ensure the continuing presence of Mr. Bush, Canada argued that since the complainants' allegations referred to executive acts of a US president, pertaining evidence would be only available in the US. In the absence of a reasonable expectation to obtain assistance from the US authorities, however, the State party allegedly had no basis on which it could take Bush into custody. Hence, according to Canada, the detention of Bush for the purpose of Article 6 was not warranted (ibid, para 4.3.). The State party further submitted that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police did not conduct an investigation, since there would have been no realistic prospect in October 2011, that sufficient evidence to support a charge against Bush could have been assembled so as to justify detention (ibid, para 4.17.). It concluded that it neither possessed key evidentiary elements nor were it likely to obtain them. Hence, the State party argued, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police did not launch an investigation, and maintained that it was an entirely reasonable conclusion (ibid, para 4.18.). The State party further argued that any decision to detain an alleged perpetrator in transit through Canada would require a consideration of the results of a criminal investigation. Only if an investigation reveals reasonable and probable

22 Since the Committee against Torture ruled the case inadmissible as it would not fall within the scope of Article 22,²⁰ no authoritative decision on the merits of the case is available. Notwithstanding this caveat, the substantive arguments put forward by the State party warrant some critical remarks.²¹ As correctly raised by Canada, Article 6(1) grants the State party some discretion when it comes to deciding whether to ensure the continuing presence of the alleged perpetrator on its territory. Obviously, this discretion has however its limits.

23 Article 6(1) states that a State party's decision whether to ensure the continuing presence of an alleged perpetrator must be preceded by an examination of the 'information available'. In relation to the information submitted by the complainants' counsel to the Attorney General about a month prior to the visit of Mr. Bush, the State party stated that the timing and volume of the submission would not have permitted a 'thorough investigation'.²² Furthermore, the State party argued that

[w]here an alleged perpetrator is in transit through a State or a temporary visitor rather than someone resident in the State, it is unlikely that the forum State will have undertaken an investigation in advance, proprio motu, in the hope or expectation that the alleged perpetrator might transit through or make a short visit.²³

Consequently, the case HBA et al v Canada would be different than the Habré case in which the Committee found Senegal to have violated its obligation under Article 6(1).

24 Canada is correct when it refers to Nowak and McArthur (2008) who state that the decision not to initiate a prosecution does not amount to a violation of Article 7(1), if the competent authorities are of the view that there is insufficient evidence to obtain a conviction.²⁴ The State party, however, ignores that this discretion is premised on the competent authorities having already conducted an investigation which was implemented in such a way that it had indeed the potential to produce such evidence, if it exists. For an investigation to be possible, however, Canada would have been required under Article 6(1) to arrest or take other measures to ensure the presence of Mr. Bush. By the State party's own admission, however, such investigation has never taken place since it was considered that 'there was no realistic prospect [...] that sufficient evidence to support a charge against Mr. Bush could have been assembled so as to justify detention'.²⁵

25 By taking the lack of a 'realistic prospect' as a foregone conclusion the State implicitly argues to have no further obligations under the Convention and hence does not violate it. Whether there was indeed no 'realistic prospect' to prosecute is questionable, since an investigation was never started, cooperation of the US authorities was never sought, and potential avenues which would not have required cooperation of the US were never pursued. Furthermore, and somewhat circularly, the State party argues that it would require the results of an investigation in order to decide whether to ensure the presence of Bush, but at the same time acknowledges that no investigation was initiated since it was unlikely to obtain the cooperation of the US authorities.

26 The State party's claims suggest that it considered it as necessary to conduct a full and in-depth review of the dossier submitted by the counsel, before being in the position to decide whether to ensure the continuing presence of the former US President. This reading is misguided. While the State party obviously has to disregard unsubstantiated allegations, the information available at this stage does not have to conclusively prove the raised allegations, let alone live up to evidentiary standards as required in a criminal trial. The purpose of the examination required under Article 6(1) is to establish whether the raised allegations are credibly substantiated to such a level that the initiation of a formal criminal investigation is warranted.

27 The interpretation of Article 6(1) put forward by Canada in the HBA et al v Canada case would result in a considerable weakening of the Convention regarding its intent to close safe havens. This would be particularly the case when the suspected torturer is present only for a brief period on the territory under the jurisdiction of the State party. Put together, the limitation to initiate an investigation only from the moment when the alleged perpetrator is present, on the one hand, and the requirement of the availability of results of a thorough criminal investigation before being able to ensure the alleged perpetrator's presence, on the other hand, would de facto result in a 'blind spot' in the obligation to prosecute torturers. Cases, in which the alleged perpetrator is only briefly on the territory under the jurisdiction of the State party would become unlikely to be ever prosecuted.

3.1.2 Custody or Other Legal Measures to Ensure Presence

28 Since torture is a serious crime that, according to Article 4(2), shall be punishable by appropriate penalties which take into account its grave nature, the measures necessary to ensure the presence of the alleged torturer usually mean arrest and detention that is police custody up to a few days followed by pre-trial detention and/or detention pending deportation.

29 On the other hand, States should take into account that, by virtue of Article 9(3) CCPR, it 'shall not be the general rule that persons awaiting trial shall be detained in custody'. Article 6(1) CAT therefore also provides for the possibility to make use of 'other legal measures' to ensure the presence of the alleged torturer, including house arrest, release on bail, the confiscation of travel documents, an obligation to report regularly to the police, and similar restrictions on freedom of movement.²⁶ Whether or not custodial measures are necessary depends on the particular circumstances of the case, such as the likelihood that the suspected torturer might flee from the jurisdiction of the State, abscond, or destroy evidence.²⁷ If the person is detained, he or she must enjoy all the rights of detained persons, above all habeas corpus rights.

30 The original US draft did not mention ‘custody’ but only the general obligation of States parties to ‘take the appropriate measures under its internal law so as to ensure his presence for the purpose of prosecution or extradition’.²⁸ The revised Swedish draft replaced this formulation by ‘custody and other measures to ensure his presence’ and deleted the explicit reference to the purpose of such measures. During the discussions in the Working Group, the word ‘legal’ was added before ‘measures’. This means that States parties are expected to take the same measures as are provided for in their domestic law in the case of any ordinary offence of a serious nature. This principle is expressed in the last sentence of Article 6(1) and reaffirmed in Article 7(2) for the next phase of decision-making.

3.1.2.1 Almatov Case (Germany)

31 The visit of then Uzbek Minister of Interior Zokir Almatov to Germany and the failure of the German authorities to secure Almatov’s presence is another instructive example for the challenges to ensure the implementation of Article 6.²⁹ Almatov visited Germany in late 2005 on the basis of a humanitarian visa in order to receive medical treatment. In December, eight Uzbeks living in Germany filed complaints with the German Federal Prosecutor in which they accused Almatov of being criminally responsible for torture and torture as a crime against humanity perpetrated in Uzbekistan’s places of detention as well as for crimes against humanity in relation to the Andijan massacre.³⁰ The complaints were supported by Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch. Furthermore, the UN Special Rapporteur on Torture called upon the German authorities to initiate criminal proceedings against Almatov.³¹ However, soon after reports about the complaints were published in the German news, Almatov left Germany without ever being questioned by the German authorities.

32 Under the Convention Germany has an obligation to exercise its jurisdiction under Article 5(2) and to ensure the presence of alleged torturers on its territory as required in Article 6(1). Confronted with the question why it failed to do so in the case of Almatov, Germany submitted in its fifth periodic report to the Committee against Torture that

[t]he German criminal prosecution authorities had become aware that Mr. Almatov was staying in Germany when a first complaint of an offence was brought against him on 5 December 2005. He had, however, already left Germany at that point. For that reason the Public Prosecutor General decided not to institute investigation proceedings against Mr. Almatov.³²

33 Although Germany's failure to secure the presence of Mr. Almatov was never subject of a complaint to the Committee against Torture and the Committee did also not take up the issue when considering Germany's fifth periodic report, and hence no authoritative evaluation of the matter is available, a few critical remarks are in order. Article 6(1) obliges States parties to secure the presence of alleged torturers on their territory 'upon being satisfied, after an examination of information available to it ...'. The wording 'information available to it' does not imply that either the presence of an alleged torturer on the State party's territory or the related incriminating information must be raised by complainants and submitted as a formal complaint for the State party's authorities being obliged to act. This would be an impermissible restrictive reading of Article 6(1).³³ Whenever the State party's authorities know about the presence of an alleged torturer they are obliged to act. In the case of Almatov, these requirements were—in all likelihood—fulfilled. The German authorities knew about Almatov's presence already prior to the complaint of 5 December since they issued him with a humanitarian visa on 14 November to facilitate his medical treatment. Furthermore, the German authorities must have also had sufficient information on Almatov's alleged role in the Andijan massacre as well as in the systematic abuse of persons held in Uzbekistan's places of detention since the visa was issued as an exception to an EU-wide travel ban imposed on persons considered to be responsible for the Andijan massacre.³⁴ Almatov was on top of this list and the German authorities had consulted with the EU Commission and Presidency prior to issuing the visa.³⁵ While it cannot be expected from a State party to check for every visa request whether the applicant is an alleged torturer, it seems reasonable to argue that in cases as high profile and well documented as the one of Almatov, the State party's authorities would be obliged to act on their own initiative.

34 There can be cases in which the application of non-custodial measures to ensure the presence of the alleged torturer eventually turn out to be insufficient. In the French case of Ely Ould Dah,³⁶ the army commander was alleged to have committed acts of torture in 1990 and 1991 in a military camp in Mauritania. Triggered by a complaint of Mauritanian exiles living in France, Mr. Ould Dah was arrested by French authorities in 1999 while undertaking training at a French army school, and taken into custody. Following an appeal with the French judicial authorities, Mr. Ould Dah was released and placed under judicial control, ie, under house arrest with his passport confiscated. However, these measures eventually proved insufficient to ensure his presence. In April 2000, Mr. Ould Dah absconded and returned to Mauritania, where he continued to serve in the national army. Irrespective of his flight, the French authorities continued to prosecute Mr. Ould Dah, with the participation of his legal representatives in the proceedings. Eventually, in July 2005 the Nîmes Assize Court (Cour d'assises) sentenced Mr. Ould Dah in absentia to the maximum penalty of ten years of imprisonment for having directly committed, ordered, and organized acts of torture. While welcoming the sentencing of Mr. Ould Dah, the Committee against Torture expressed regret of France's failure to have taken the necessary steps to keep Mr. Ould Dah in its territory, and to indeed ensure his presence for his trial, in conformity with its obligation under Article 6.³⁷

3.1.2.3 Al-Duri Case (Austria)

35 A prominent and politically sensitive case highlighting a State party's failure to perform its obligations under Article 6 relates to the presence of Izzat Ibrahim Khalil Al-Duri³⁸ in Austria in 1999. Al-Duri, then Deputy Chair of the Revolutionary Council of Iraq and Deputy of Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein, had travelled to Vienna for medical treatment. Based on evidence collected in an Austrian and a Swedish court, a Vienna city councillor submitted a complaint with the Public Prosecutor alleging that Al-Duri was criminally responsible for the torture of two Iraqis as well as other citizens. Furthermore, the Public Prosecutor was requested to 'arrange the arrest of the accused Izzat Ibrahim Khalil Al-Duri and to commence with the investigation of the facts of the case'.³⁹ Reportedly, the Public Prosecutor subsequently instituted investigations.

36 While the politically charged public discussion partly focused on the question, why a visa had been granted to Al-Duri in the first place, the Austrian Minister of Justice erroneously argued that Austria would not be in the position to prosecute under universal jurisdiction in the absence of an extradition request by another State. Eventually, Al-Duri, who had not been arrested during the prosecutor's investigations or subject to any other measures restricting his freedom of movement, was able to leave the country. Although the conduct of the Austrian authorities was never legally challenged, for example before the Committee against Torture, there is little doubt that the Austrian authorities failed to perform their obligation under Article 6(1) to take Al-Duri into custody or take other legal measures to ensure his presence, as well as in the absence of an extradition request, to submit the case to the competent authorities for the purpose of prosecution in accordance with Article 7.

3.1.3 'Only for such time as necessary'

37 According to the last sentence of Article 6(1), the custody or other legal measures 'may be continued only for such time as is necessary to enable any criminal or extradition proceedings to be instituted'. This phrase, while intended to be a 'general indication',⁴⁰ which does not appear in the US draft and was inserted by the revised Swedish draft, is somewhat misleading. The word 'custody' and its restriction until the 'institution' of criminal or extradition proceedings might lead to the narrow literal interpretation of police custody, which should never last longer than a few days. The purpose of this provision goes, however, beyond this initial stage of the proceedings. Even after criminal or extradition proceedings have been instituted, the suspected torturer might be kept in detention, if the circumstances of the particular case require such a measure. Detention and other measures to ensure the presence of a suspected torturer during the criminal and/or extradition proceedings might be maintained until his or her conviction or deportation.⁴¹

3.2 Article 6(2): Obligation to Make a Preliminary Inquiry Into the Facts

38 Once the State party decided under Article 6(1) to ensure the presence of an alleged perpetrator, paragraph 2 obliges it to 'immediately make a preliminary inquiry into the facts'. Such criminal investigation is based on the information made available by victims and other sources as indicated in Article 6(1), but also requires active measures of evidence gathering, such as interrogation of the alleged torturer, taking of witness testimonies, inquiries on the spot, or searching for documentary evidence. If the alleged act of torture was committed on the territory of the investigating State, its authorities can apply all usual methods of criminal investigation. If the investigating State intends to exercise its jurisdiction on the basis of Article 5(1)(b), (c), or (2), it needs the cooperation of the territorial State and possibly also other States.⁴² For this reason, Article 9 explicitly establishes an obligation of States parties to provide mutual judicial assistance.

39 The purpose of the preliminary inquiry in Article 6(2) is to enable the investigating State to decide whether to exercise jurisdiction by means of criminal prosecution or to extradite the alleged torturer to another State. The discussions of the words 'preliminary inquiry' during the 1980 Working Group, which led to the insertion of the phrase 'after an examination of information available to it' in Article 6(1) show that the inquiry in Article 6(2) goes already beyond the available information on the basis of which the State party has to decide whether it is warranted to ensure the presence of the alleged torturer. The preliminary inquiry under Article 6(2) has to include information actively gathered by the competent authorities. It does not end, as the last sentence of Article 6(1) might suggest, with the 'institution' of criminal or extradition proceedings, but with the decision whether to prosecute or to extradite the suspected torturer.

40 In those cases in which the alleged torturer is arrested on the basis of an international arrest warrant and the custodial State is requested to extradite, it is the requesting State which primarily makes an inquiry into the facts and provides the custodial State with the information necessary to justify extradition.⁴³ However, this does not absolve the custodial State from conducting his own investigation in order to verify whether the arrest warrant and extradition request are indeed sufficiently substantiated. Furthermore, as part of this investigation the custodial State has also to assure itself that the requesting State is indeed willing and able to prosecute the alleged torturer and that extradition is not facilitating impunity. Similarly, the custodial State is also required to seek information on whether an extradition to the requesting State would violate the non-refoulement principle. Should it turn out that this is the case the custodial State itself has to prosecute or, if present, extradite the alleged torturer to another State requesting extradition.

3.2.1 The Habré Case before the ICJ—Questions Relating to the Obligation to Prosecute or Extradite (Belgium v Senegal)

41 The duty to immediately make a preliminary inquiry under Article 6(2) was also adjudicated in the Habré case before the International Court of Justice (ICJ).⁴⁴ In its judgement the Court elaborated on the nature as well as the timing of the investigation required under Article 6(2).

42 The Court submitted that the intention of the inquiry stipulated in Article 6(2) is to 'corroborate or not the suspicions regarding the person in question'.⁴⁵ While the 'choice of means for conducting the inquiry remains in the hands of the State',⁴⁶ the inquiry has to be conducted by the competent authorities which are tasked to draw up case files and collect facts and evidence, including witness statements. The obligation under Article 6(2) would have therefore required Senegal inter alia to actively seek evidence, including contacting Chadian authorities. However, no such steps were taken. The questioning of Mr. Habré by the investigative judge in 2000 in order to establish Habré's identity and to inform him of the accusations brought forward against him 'cannot be regarded as performance of the obligation laid down in Article 6, paragraph 2, as it did not involve any inquiry into the charges against Mr. Habré'.⁴⁷

⁴³ Burger and Danelius (n 14) 135; see also Berg (n 1) 219.

⁴⁴ Questions relating to the Obligation to Prosecute or Extradite (Belgium v Senegal), Judgment of 20 July 2012, ICJ Reports 2012 422. In the Guengueng et al v Senegal case before the CAT Committee which also dealt with the obligations of Senegal in relation to the Habré case, the complainants did not claim any violation under Art 6, but only in relation to Art 5 and Art 7. See Suleymane Guengueng et al v Senegal, No 181/ 2001, UN Doc CAT/C/36/D/181/2001, 17 May 2006. For an overview of the case see above Art 5 §§ 102–08 and below Art 7 §§ 50–51.

43 Instructively, the Court also elaborated on the required timing of an investigation under Article 6(2). In general, it held that ‘steps must be taken as soon as the suspect is identified in the territory of the State’.⁴⁸ This requirement is an important difference to the State party’s obligations under Article 12 and 13 which have to be performed irrespective of whether the suspect is present or known.⁴⁹ In the Habré case, the obligation to initiate a preliminary investigation arose ‘immediately’ as soon as the Senegal authorities had reason to suspect Mr. Habré, who was in their territory, of being responsible for acts of torture. This point was reached ‘at least since the year 2000, when a complaint was filed in Senegal against Mr. Habré’.⁵⁰

44 The Court’s finding is insofar noteworthy as it concluded Senegal to be in violation of Article 6(2) irrespective of the performance of its obligation under Article 5(2). While the ICJ had not considered whether Senegal violated Article 5(2),⁵¹ it is implicit in the Court’s reasoning on Article 7 that Senegal had failed to establish the required jurisdiction under Article 5(2) until the legal amendments in 2007 and 2008.⁵² Consequently, the Court’s ruling implies that the absence of the required legal framework under Article 5(2), or any other required jurisdiction under Article 5, does not absolve the State party to perform its obligations under Article 6(2).

45 Senegal’s breach of Article 6(2) continued also after 2008 when it eventually had amended its legal framework following the Committee against Torture’s decision in the Guengueng et al case.⁵³ Although the required jurisdiction under Article 5 would have been available from then on, Senegal continued to fail initiating a preliminary inquiry, even after the submission of a further complaint to its authorities in 2008.⁵⁴

3.3 Article 6(3): Obligation to Assist in Communicating with Representative of the State

46 Article 6(3) requires the State party to assist the alleged torturer to communicate with the nearest appropriate representative of the State of which he or she is a national, or, if a stateless person,⁵⁵ with the representative of the State where he or she usually resides. Importantly, it remains at the discretion of the detainee, whether he or she indeed wants to contact eg its local embassy or consulate. The State party is only obliged to assist, for example, by providing a phone and the relevant phone number, and cannot

Furthermore, in 2010 Senegal confirmed before the ECOWAS Court of Justice that no proceedings against Mr. Habré would be ongoing or pending. The ICJ’s decision that Senegal had violated its obligation under Art 6(2), however, did not remain without objections. In a separate opinion, Judge Yusuf criticized the decision of the majority for elevating the requirements pertaining to the preliminary inquiry under Article 6(2) to those of a full criminal investigation. invoke the alleged perpetrator's right under Article 6(3) against his or her will. This also means the custodial State cannot grant the authorities of the detainee's country of nationality or residence the right to communicate with the detainee, if he does not want so.⁵⁶ The US proposal to include into the Convention the explicit right to be visited by a representative of the State of nationality or residence did not find its way into Article 6(3). Nevertheless, this right derives from Article 36(1)(c) of the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations.⁵⁷

3.4 Article 6(4): Obligation to Notify Other States of the Measures Taken and Intended to Be Taken

3.4.1 Application to All Forms of Jurisdiction under Article 5

47 Article 6(4) is addressed to all States parties which exercised their jurisdiction under Article 5 and hence not limited to universal jurisdiction cases. Although the article was kept in square brackets for several years during the drafting process because of its connection with the question of universal jurisdiction,⁵⁸ and irrespective of its reference to Article 5(1) in the first sentence, its systematic interpretation shows that Article 6(4) applies to all grounds of jurisdiction stipulated in Article 5. Hence, the safeguards of Article 6(4) are pertaining to cases in which the custodial State seeks to exercise universal jurisdiction as well as to cases in which a State seeks to exercise jurisdiction on the basis of the territorial, active or passive nationality principle.⁵⁹

3.4.2 'Has taken a person into custody'

48 The wording of the first sentence of Article 6(4) refers only to those cases in which the alleged torturer was taken into custody under Article 6(1). This limitation, with its apparent exclusion of suspected torturers whose freedom of movement has been restricted with non-custodial measures, seems surprising. On the one hand, a potential explanation for this limitation could be that the first sentence was intended to provide an additional safeguard to persons held in custody by informing their State of nationality. Although Article 6(3) already facilitates suspects to communicate with their representatives, Article 6(4) contributes further safeguards by requiring the custodial State to inform the alleged torturer's country of origin (Article 5(1)(b)). However, it is not clear why a notification of States which may have no direct link with the alleged perpetrator (such as States with territorial or passive nationality jurisdiction) should be informed in order to safeguard the alleged torturer's rights. On the other hand, if the purpose of Article 6(4) is to inform other States with potential jurisdiction over the case so that they can make a decision on whether to request extradition or not, the exclusion of cases in which the presence of the

They shall also have the right to visit any national of the sending State who is in prison, custody or detention in their district in pursuance of a judgment. Nevertheless, consular officers shall refrain from taking action on behalf of a national who is in prison, custody or detention if he expressly opposes such action.' alleged perpetrator is ensured by non-custodial measures appears to constitute a gap. In practical terms, this gap however is likely to be marginal since securing the presence of the alleged torturer by non-custodial measures represents the exception rather than the norm. Considering the severity of the alleged crime as well as the danger of the alleged torturer absconding, custody will be in most cases the required choice.

3.4.3 'Immediately notify'

49 As stipulated in the first sentence of Article 6(4), the custodial State is obliged to notify States with jurisdiction under Article 5(1) 'immediately'. This is generally interpreted to mean within a few hours.⁶⁰

3.4.4 'States referred to in Article 5(1)'

50 If the custodial State is identical with the territorial State, it only must notify other States if the alleged torturer and/or victims are nationals of another State. If the custodial State exercises jurisdiction based on the active nationality principle under Article 5(1)(b), it must notify the territorial State and possibly also States whose nationals were tortured by the person concerned. If the custodial State exercises jurisdiction based on the passive nationality principle under Article 5(1)(c), it must notify the territorial State and, if different, the State whose national the alleged torturer is. If the custodial State exercises universal jurisdiction, it must notify all States having jurisdiction pursuant to Article 5(1).

51 The obligation to notify States with jurisdiction under Article 5(1) is of 'a general character'⁶¹ meaning it must be performed even if the custodial State has from the outset the intention to prosecute and not to extradite the alleged torturer.⁶² Indirectly, this requirement also arises by the duty of the custodial State to contact as part of its investigation other States which may possess relevant information pertaining to the case. As required by Article 9(1), all States parties shall afford another the greatest measure of assistance in relation to criminal proceedings, including the supply of all available evidence.⁶³

3.4.5 Duty to Promptly Report Findings of Preliminary Inquiry

52 The second sentence of Article 6(3) refers to the preliminary inquiry under Article 6(2). The custodial State which is normally tasked to conduct such an inquiry, must promptly report the findings of the inquiry to States with jurisdiction under Article 5(1). In such a report, the State shall also indicate whether it intends to exercise jurisdiction.

53 The word 'promptly' illustrates that such preliminary inquiries shall be conducted speedily, if possible within a few weeks. The length of criminal investigations depends on the complexity and the particular circumstances of each individual case. The purpose of this reporting obligation is again primarily to enable all States with a possible interest in prosecuting the alleged torturer to decide whether or not to request extradition.⁶⁴ Even if the custodial State indicates its intention to exercise jurisdiction, other States, above all the territorial State, might request the extradition of the person concerned. custodial State, such extradition request may be of assistance in its decision on prosecution or extradition as required by Article 7. Since Article 5 does not contain any hierarchy as to the different grounds of jurisdiction, it is finally up to the custodial State to decide whether to exercise jurisdiction and to prosecute the suspected torturer or to extradite him or her.

Aut Dedere aut Judicare

2. These authorities shall take their decision in the same manner as in the case of any ordinary offence of a serious nature under the law of that State. In the cases referred to in article 5, paragraph 2, the standards of evidence required for prosecution and conviction shall in no way be less stringent than those which apply in the cases referred to in article 5, paragraph 1.

1. Introduction¹

1 The territorial, national, and flag States have an obligation, under Article 5(1), to start criminal investigations whenever their authorities have sufficient reasons to assume that an act of torture has been committed in any territory under their jurisdiction, on board a ship or aircraft registered under their flag, or by any of their nationals. If the domestic law of a State party also provides for jurisdiction in accordance with the passive nationality principle (Art 5(1)(c)), its authorities shall also initiate criminal investigations in all cases in which their citizens have been subjected to torture in another State.² Territorial States, in addition, have an obligation under Article 12, to ensure that their competent authorities proceed to a prompt and impartial ex officio investigation.³

2 While these obligations to start investigating apply irrespective of the presence of the suspected torturer, Articles 6 and 7 establish increased obligations for States parties in whose territory a suspected torturer is present (the so-called forum States).⁴ They shall ensure the presence of such persons by effective custodial or non-custodial measures in accordance with Article 6, carry out preliminary inquiries into the facts, and notify other States parties of the custody and the findings of their investigations in order to facilitate possible extradition requests.

3 After having conducted these preliminary steps, the forum State has an obligation under Article 7(1) to submit the case to its competent authorities for the purpose of prosecution. In other words, the strongest obligation to avoid a safe haven for perpetrators of torture by bringing them to justice before their domestic courts applies to the forum State. This obligation derives from the mere fact that a suspected torturer is present, for whatever reason, in any territory under the jurisdiction of a State party.

4 The forum State may at the same time be the territorial, flag, or national State. But the obligation to prosecute a suspected torturer also applies if the forum State has no connection to the suspected torturer other than his or her presence in a territory under its jurisdiction.⁵ If a suspected torturer is in the territory of a State party only for the purpose of medical treatment, as in the Pinochet, Al-Duri, and Almatov cases, for the purpose of professional training, as in the Ould Dah case, or as a person granted asylum, as in the Zardad case, the authorities of this State are under an obligation to exercise universal jurisdiction.⁶

Universal Jurisdiction Annual Review 2017' (March 2017) <https://redress.org/wp-content/uploads/2017/03/Report_UJ_March-2017.pdf> accessed 3 December 2017. Accordingly, as of 2016, there have been twelve torture cases with proceedings under universal jurisdiction, out of which six were at the investigation stage (see TRIAL International et al, 69–70). 5 The only possibility to avoid prosecution is extradition. The choice between prosecution and extradition (aut dedere aut judicare) applies, however, only if another State explicitly requests extradition. While prosecution constitutes an obligation for the forum State, no other State, ie, not even the territorial State, is under an obligation to request extradition. This principle has been confirmed by the Committee against Torture in the case of Rosenmann v Spain concerning the extradition of General Pinochet from the UK to Spain.⁷ Similarly, the forum State is under no obligation to comply with any request for extradition. But it violates its obligation under Article 7 if it neither prosecutes nor extradites the suspected torturer, as the Committee has affirmed in the Habré case.⁸

16 In written comments based on the 1978 original Swedish draft the United States indicated that in their view the Convention does not or should not express a preference for prosecution or extradition while at the same time noting the obligation of a State party to institute criminal proceedings against an alleged offender unless such an offender is extradited. The United States therefore submitted an alternative proposal.

17 The United States submitted a second text indicating that they could accept that, as in Article 11(2) of the Swedish draft, a State party should have an obligation to institute 'criminal, disciplinary or other appropriate proceedings' in alleged cases of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment and that the broader range of permissible proceedings reflected the broader range of condemned behavior inherent in cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment as opposed to torture.

18 France, considering it essential to retain the principle of the advisability of instituting proceedings, proposed that the words 'ensure that criminal proceedings are instituted' in paragraph 1 of the original Swedish draft be replaced by the phrase 'submit the case to its competent authorities for the institution of criminal proceedings'. Switzerland proposed a formulation based on the view that paragraph 1 could be strengthened by requiring that proceedings be instituted without exception or undue delay.

19 The United States further suggested the addition of a new article in order to safeguard the rights of the accused: 'Any person regarding whom proceedings are being carried out in connection with any of the offences set forth in this Convention shall be guaranteed fair treatment at all stages of the proceedings.' This wording was adopted at this stage as Article 6(5) of the revised Swedish draft.

20 The United Kingdom felt that the wording of Article 11(1) should be amended to reflect Article 7 of the Hague Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Seizure of Aircraft and to this end proposed an alternative text. After informal consultations, Sweden submitted its revised draft, in which the corresponding provision appeared in Article 7.

21 There was no discussion on this matter in the 1979 Working Group. It was suggested during the 1980 Working Group that Articles 7 and 5 be considered together because of the complementary nature of the two provisions.¹⁹ One delegate queried whether Article 7 did not partly duplicate Article 5(1)(a). Other delegates, referring to previously adopted conventions such as Article 8(1) of the UN Convention against the Taking of Hostages, pointed out that there was a need for such an article. Article 8(1) of the 'New York Hostages Convention' was designed to ensure that all those who are accused of committing acts of hostage-taking are brought to justice. The obligation under Article 8(1) requires any party in whose territory an alleged offender is found to submit the case to its appropriate authorities for the purpose of prosecution, unless it decides instead to extradite him or her. This principle, aut dedere aut judicare, is considered one of the most important obligations of the Convention. During the drafting of the Convention it was considered not sufficient for a convention of this type to require parties to make the listed offences punishable under their domestic laws, nor was it sufficient to require them to establish jurisdiction over such offences. Rather, it was also essential to require States actually to deal with those persons who are accused of such offences.

22 During the drafting of the 'New York Hostages Convention', the delegations of the Netherlands and France had submitted proposals which would have conditioned a

State's obligation aut dedere aut judicare upon it having received and denied a request for extradition from a State which is required under the Convention to establish primary jurisdiction over the offence. The representative of the Netherlands argued that it was unreasonable to oblige a State which has no connection with the offence, other than the offender's subsequent presence in the territory, to prosecute the offender. Although it was recognized that it seemed unfair to impose the obligation to prosecute upon a State that had nothing to do with a given case apart from the fact that the perpetrator was subsequently found in its territory, while other States with primary jurisdiction refrained from requesting extradition, it was conceded that it was better to increase rather than reduce the number of States having jurisdiction. Similarly, the purpose of Article 7 CAT is to ensure that no offender would have the opportunity to escape the consequences of his or her acts of torture. He or she would be extradited or prosecuted. The Working Group suspended its consideration of Article 7 until a later stage.

23 When it considered Article 7, the 1981 Working Group had before it an amendment submitted by the Netherlands.²⁰ In support of this amendment, some delegations said that in their view it brought out more clearly than the Swedish text an essential link with Article 5, while the terms of paragraph 2 allowed for more flexibility insofar as the modalities for applying the article were concerned. In their view, the main advantage of the Netherlands amendment was its qualification of the operation of universal jurisdiction by referring to complaint procedures. They also considered that paragraph 3 of the Netherlands amendment contained a timely reminder of a fundamental principle relating to the rights of the accused in criminal proceedings.

24 According to other speakers, the Netherlands amendment lacked the requisite clarity so far as some of its wording—in particular, the words 'upon complaint by any interested party'—was concerned, and could give rise to loose interpretation and open up loopholes. In the view of these members, Article 7 of the Swedish draft provided a better working basis.

25 The Working Group decided to adopt paragraph 3, amended in fine, of the Netherlands amendment as the last paragraph of Article 7:

3. Any person regarding whom proceedings are being brought in connection with any offence set forth in Article 4 shall enjoy all the guarantees of a fair and equitable trial.

26 Brazil and Sweden submitted a second revised version of draft Article 7. However, following a discussion which revealed, in particular, that there were reservations in regard to paragraph 4, the sponsors withdrew their proposal and the Working Group adjourned consideration of Article 7.

27 During informal consultations the following text was proposed:

The State Party with jurisdiction over the territory in which a person alleged to have committed any offence referred to in Article 4 is found shall, if it does not extradite him, be obliged, in cases contemplated in Article 5, to submit the case to its competent authorities, which, for the purpose of prosecution, shall take their decision in the same manner as in the case of any offence of a serious nature under the law of that State.

28 In 1982 the Working Group continued its consideration of Article 7 of the revised Swedish draft.²¹ The Group felt that Article 7 should be examined together with Article 5 as well as Article 6(4) in view of the close link between these provisions. The delegate of the Netherlands informed the group that the Dutch Government had decided to withdraw the amendment it had submitted in 1981 with regard to Article 7.

29 Several speakers considered that a system of universal or quasi-universal jurisdiction as envisaged in Articles 5 and 7 of the Swedish draft was indispensable in a Convention against Torture in order to ensure that there would be no 'safe havens' for torturers. Corresponding provisions had already been included in many other treaties for the suppression of crimes which the international community deemed unacceptable.²²

30 Some delegates indicated that, although their Governments had previously expressed reservations concerning the inclusion of a system of universal jurisdiction in the proposed Convention against Torture, they were now prepared to accept it in order to facilitate agreement. However, several other delegations maintained their opposition to or reservations concerning the inclusion of a system of universal jurisdiction in the draft Convention. Difficulties of a practical kind were mentioned as regards the transfer of evidence from the country where the crime had been committed towards the State of arrest and trial under the universal jurisdiction clause. If the latter State would not extradite the alleged offender to the former State, this might lead to frictions which would turn illusory the holding of a fair trial against the defendant, since it would be impossible to obtain the necessary evidence. Misgivings were also expressed that the system of universal jurisdiction could be exploited for political reasons and that it could result in trials on the basis of spurious accusations and fabricated evidence.

31 The Argentinian delegation expressed the view that the system of universal jurisdiction was not the appropriate one to deal with a crime that is not international in its nature, like those dealt with in the conventions cited as precedents in the Working Group. This delegation stated that the primary objective of the Convention should be to ensure compliance with its norms by any State which does not punish acts of torture carried out by its public officials. According to this delegation, the establishment of universal jurisdiction would not contribute to this end, since such a system would only apply to the improbable case in which a torturer would leave his or her own State where he or she enjoyed impunity for the committed crimes, in order to travel to another State which, being a party to the Convention, might arrest and prosecute. The system that was proposed to face this highly hypothetical case could be a source of controversies between States. The intention of a State to prosecute a case of torture on the basis of universal jurisdiction could be interpreted by the State where the crime had been committed as a demonstration of a lack of trust in its own judicial system, a violation of its sovereignty, and even as an interference in its internal affairs.

32 The US delegation replied that universal jurisdiction was intended primarily to deal with situations where torture is a State policy and, therefore, the State in question does not, by definition, prosecute its officials who conduct torture. For the international community to leave enforcement of the Convention to such a State would essentially be a formula to do nothing. Therefore, in such cases, universal jurisdiction would be the most effective weapon against torture, which can be brought to bear. It could be utilized against state officials responsible for torture who travel to other States, a situation which is not at all hypothetical. It could also be used against torturers fleeing from a change of Government in their States if, for legal reasons, extradition to that State were not possible.

33 Regarding due process and the adequacy of evidence, it was stated that the text of the draft Convention as a whole, including the Chair's proposed Article 7, made it clear that criminal prosecution would take place only when adequate evidence exists and it is possible to ensure fair treatment at all stages of the proceedings. In particular cases, such as when a torture victim is present on a State party's territory, it would be quite possible to meet these requirements.

34 During the discussion of Article 7, reference was also made to a revised version that had been submitted in 1981 by Brazil and Sweden but that subsequently had been withdrawn, as well as to a text proposed in 1981 during informal consultations which the Group had not been able to discuss owing to lack of time. The possibility was mentioned of redrafting Article 7, taking into account those alternative proposals and qualifying the exercise of universal jurisdiction in a manner, which could alleviate some of the concerns expressed by delegations, in particular regarding the risk of discrepancies as to the standards of evidence.

35 In light of these discussions, the Chairman-Rapporteur proposed a new text. A number of delegations supported this suggestion in general terms, considering that it was a constructive synthesis, which retained the substance of the original Swedish draft while making clear certain protections accorded to an accused. Some other delegates observed that the new proposal did not significantly reduce their difficulties concerning the acceptance of the principle of universal jurisdiction. During the debate arguments were reiterated that had been put forward in earlier discussions.

36 In the course of the discussions concerning the proposal of the Chairman-Rapporteur most speakers indicated that their Governments were prepared to support the inclusion of a system of universal jurisdiction in the draft Convention. In particular one delegation announced that its Government, although retaining its reservations concerning the advisability of including universal jurisdiction in the CAT, had now decided to accept this in the interests of facilitating progress towards agreement on a final text.

37 One other delegation stated that it could accept the proposed text for Article 7, depending on its understanding of Article 5, since it preferred to make the establishment of universal jurisdiction as envisaged in Article 5(2) dependent on the refusal of a request for extradition. The view was also expressed that paragraph 2 of Article 5 would be more acceptable if the provision specifying that the alleged offender should normally be tried by the State in whose territory the offence was committed be added to the paragraph. Nevertheless, some delegations made it clear that they could not accept the inclusion of a system of universal jurisdiction in the Convention.

38 Several speakers who supported the proposal of the Chairman-Rapporteur in general terms stated that in their view some drafting changes would be desirable. In particular, the text should be harmonized with the formulations already appearing in comparable treaties such as the Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Seizure of Aircrafts. After consultations with these delegates, the Chairman-Rapporteur submitted a revised version of his proposal which was again discussed in the Working Group. This discussion led to further amendments of the text.

39 Article 7, as it emerged finally from the discussion, read as follows:

1. The State Party in territory under whose jurisdiction a person alleged to have committed any offence referred to in article 4 is found, shall in the cases contemplated in article 5, if it does not extradite him, submit the case to its competent authorities for the purpose of prosecution.

2. These authorities shall take their decision in the same manner as in the case of any ordinary offence of a serious nature under the law of that State. In the cases referred to in article 5, paragraph 2, the standards of evidence required for prosecution and conviction shall in no way be less stringent than those which apply in the cases referred to in article 5, paragraph 1.
3. Any person regarding whom proceedings are brought in connection with any of the offences referred to in article 4 shall be guaranteed fair treatment at all stages of the proceedings.

40 It was noted that all delegations who could accept the inclusion of universal jurisdiction in the draft Convention, could support this text. The same delegations could also support the text of Article 5(2), and of Article 6(4). With regard to Article 5(2), one delegation maintained its position that the establishment of jurisdiction in Article 5(2) should be made dependent upon the refusal of a request for extradition. Some delegations stated that they had not had enough time to study the above proposal.

41 During the 1983 Working Group representatives stated that the above text might constitute a good basis for compromise and deserved careful study. One delegation observed that its Government preferred to adhere as closely as possible to the formulations used in earlier treaties such as the Hague Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Seizures of Aircraft, the Montreal Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts against the Safety of Civil Aviation, and the New York Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of Crimes against Internationally Protected Persons, including Diplomatic Agents. The Working Group decided that the Brazilian proposals should be reconsidered at a later stage.

42 The Working Group discussed at considerable length the system of universal jurisdiction included in Articles 5, 6, and 7 in the 1984 deliberations. The discussions indicated that there had been important changes as regards the 1983 session of the Group. The inclusion of universal jurisdiction was no longer opposed by any delegation. Article 7 was adopted without prejudice to the reservations of certain delegations which would be reflected in the report.

3. Issues of Interpretation

3.1 Obligation to Prosecute combined with Authorization to Extradite

43 Article 7 is closely linked to Articles 5 and 6.²³ Article 5 establishes an obligation of States parties to establish jurisdiction over the crime of torture on various grounds, including universal jurisdiction. Article 6 requires any State party, where an alleged torturer is present to ensure his or her presence, usually by means of arrest and detention, and to inform other relevant States for the purpose of enabling them, if they so wish, to make an extradition request. Article 7 establishes an obligation of the forum State to submit the case to its competent authorities for the purpose of prosecution, provided that it does not extradite the person concerned. In this relation, the International Court of Justice (ICJ) held in its judgement in Questions relating to the Obligation to Prosecute or Extradite (Belgium v Senegal) regarding Hissène Habré that 'these obligations, taken as a whole, might be regarded as elements of a single conventional mechanism aimed at preventing suspects from escaping the consequences of their criminal responsibility, if proven'.²⁴ The purpose of all these obligations is to enable proceedings against the suspect, in the absence of his or her extradition, and to achieve the object and purpose of the Convention, which is to make more effective the struggle against torture by avoiding impunity for the perpetrators of such acts. It was against this backdrop that the ICJ ruled that Senegal violated its obligations under Article 6 and 7 due to its failure to establish without delay the jurisdiction required in Article 5(2). The lack of the necessary legal framework resulted in Senegal failing to initiate the preliminary inquiry as required by Article 6(2) and subsequently to put the case to the competent authorities for the purpose of prosecution as well as extradite Habré in accordance with Article 7.²⁵

44 The basis for Article 7 of the Convention can be found in Article 7 of the 1970 Hague Hijacking Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Seizure of Aircraft, which in turn is derived from the 'aut dedere aut judicare' provisions contained in the Geneva Conventions.²⁶ Article 7 of the Hague Hijacking Convention requires '[t]he Contracting State in the territory of which the alleged offender is found shall, if it does not extradite him, be obliged without exception whatsoever and whether or not the offence was committed in its territory, to submit the case to its competent authorities for the purpose of prosecution'.

45 Since the 1970s the 'Hague formula' has become the dominant template for conventions aimed at the suppression of specific offences. Since then approximately three-quarters of the relevant conventions feature 'aut dedere aut judicare' provisions following the logic of the 'Hague formula',²⁷ including the 1985 Inter-American Convention to Prevent and Punish Torture, the 1994 Inter-American Convention on Forced Disappearance of Persons, the 2006 International Convention for the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance, and the 1986 UN Convention against Torture.²⁸

46 All these treaties have in common that the forum State has to submit the case of the alleged offender to a competent authority for the purpose of prosecution, if it does not extradite. This obligation is further combined with additional requirements demanding

(a) to criminalize the relevant offense under its domestic laws; (b) to establish jurisdiction over the offence when there is a link to the crime or when the alleged offender is present on their territory and is not extradited; (c) to make provisions to ensure that the alleged offender is under custody and there is a preliminary enquiry; and (d) to treat the offence as extraditable.²⁹

The Secretary's survey finds in total four different types of 'aut dedere aut judicare' provisions in its study of multilateral treaties. While all types stipulate a duty to extradite or prosecute, they differ in key details, eg whether domestic prosecution is contingent on the reception of an extradition request.

47 The principle of ‘aut dedere aut judicare’ as stipulated in Article 7 does not only relate to universal jurisdiction cases, but covers any case which falls under one of the jurisdictional heads stipulated in Article 5 of the Convention. Hence, States which have jurisdiction over a case under the territorial, flag, active, or passive nationality principle are not only obliged to submit it to its competent authorities for prosecution, but are also offered with the possibility to relieve themselves of this obligation by responding positively to an extradition request from another State party.

48 The only provision in Article 7 which applies exclusively to cases prosecuted under universal jurisdiction is the second sentence of Article 7(2) which requires that the standard of evidence for prosecution and conviction in these cases shall in no way be less stringent than those which apply to those cases which are prosecuted under the territorial, flag, active or passive nationality principle as stipulated in Article 5(1).

3.2 Article 7(1): Obligation of the Forum State to Proceed to Prosecution

3.2.1 ‘Submit the Case to its Competent Authorities for the Purpose of Prosecution’

49 Article 7(1) obliges States parties in the territory under whose jurisdiction an alleged torturer is found to submit the case to their competent authorities for the purpose of prosecution, unless they extradite the suspect to another State party with territorial, flag, or national jurisdiction. The formulation to ‘submit the case to its competent authorities for the purpose of prosecution’ in Article 7(1) is insofar relevant as it does not demand a prosecution in all circumstance, but leaves it at the discretion of the competent authorities to decide whether in light of the available evidence and other relevant circumstances to formally charge and prosecute the alleged torturer.³⁰ In this context the International Law Commission (ICL) concluded in its report on ‘The obligation to extradite or prosecute (aut dedere aut judicare)’ that the ‘obligation to prosecute is actually an obligation to submit the case to the prosecuting authorities; it does not involve an obligation to initiate a prosecution’.³¹

3.2.1.1 Discretion of Authorities Whether to Prosecute or Not

3.2.1.1.1 Guengueng et al v Senegal (Habré case before the CAT Committee)

50 The case of Hissène Habré and his eventual prosecution under universal jurisdiction in Senegal, inter alia for torture committed during his authoritarian rule in Chad, provides an elucidating example for a State’s obligation under Article 7 of the Convention. This is particular the case since the Committee against Torture as well as the ICJ considered Senegal’s obligations under the Convention.³²

51 In its 2007 decision on the case of Guengueng et al v Senegal, the Committee for the first time established a violation of the obligation to proceed to a prosecution under Article 7. The Committee held that the State party was obliged to prosecute Hissène Habré for alleged acts of torture unless it could show that there was not sufficient evidence to prosecute, at least at the time when the complainants submitted their complaint to the Senegalese authorities in January 2000. Yet with its decision of 20 March 2001, which was not subject to appeal, the Senegalese Court of Cassation (Cour de cassation) put an end to any possibility of prosecuting Hissène Habré in Senegal. Consequently, the Committee found that Senegal had ‘not fulfilled its obligations under article 7 of the Convention’.³³ This landmark decision of the Committee used fairly strong language by explicitly speaking of an obligation to prosecute rather than an obligation merely to submit the case to the competent authorities.³⁴

Similarly, the distinction between an ‘unconditional’ duty to prosecute and the duty to submit the case to the competent authorities was also taken up by the ICJ in its consideration of the Habré case. The ICJ’s 2012 judgment was the Court’s very first pronouncement on the obligation to extradite or prosecute.³⁵ In its analysis of Article 7(1) the ICJ drew on the Convention’s travaux préparatoires and underlined its relation to the Hague Hijacking Convention. The Court concluded that the obligation to prosecute as formulated in Article 7(1) leaves it to the competent authorities to decide ‘whether or not to initiate proceedings, thus respecting the independence of States parties’ judicial system [. . .] It follows that the competent authorities involved remain responsible for deciding on whether to initiate a prosecution, in the light of the evidence before them and the relevant rules of criminal procedure.’³⁶ ‘The obligation to submit the case to the competent authorities [. . .] may or may not result in the institutions of proceedings, in light of the evidence before them, relating to the charges against the suspect.’³⁷

52 While it is hence at the discretion of the competent authorities to decide whether to initiate a prosecution against the alleged offender, they have to do so in light of the evidence before them and the relevant rules of criminal procedure.³⁸ As a counterbalance to the discretion conferred to the competent authorities, Article 7(2) obliges them to reach their pertaining decisions ‘in the same manner as in the case of any ordinary offence of a serious nature under the law’ of the forum State. In the cases referred to in Article 5(2) the standards of evidence required for prosecution and conviction shall in no way be less stringent than those that apply in the cases referred to in Article 5(1).³⁹

³⁶ ibid, para 90. The ICJ’s reasoning is consistent with the jurisprudence of the UN Human Rights Committee which concluded that an individual does not have the right to see another individual criminally prosecuted under the ICCPR, see eg HCMA v The Netherlands, No 213/1986, UN Doc CCPR/C/35/D/213/1986, 30 March 1989; Sangeeta Shah, ‘Questions Relating to the Obligation to Prosecute or Extradite (Belgium v Senegal)’ (2013) 13 HRLR 361 fn56.

3.2.1.2 Prosecution Does Not Require Extradition Request

53 During the drafting of the Convention some States argued for the inclusion of a clause, requiring the existence of an extradition request for the forum State to become obliged to submit the case to its competent authorities for the purpose of prosecution, should it decide not to extradite. Making the duty to prosecute contingent on an extradition request was deemed by the proponents of this requirement as a precaution against what they considered an excessive use of universal jurisdiction. Eventually though, this requirement was not included and in line with the ‘Hague formula’ the State party’s duty to submit the case to its competent authorities for the purpose of prosecution is neither contingent on the reception nor the rejection of an extradition request.⁴⁰ In its decision in the Habré case, the Committee against Torture explicitly stated that ‘the obligation to prosecute the alleged perpetrator of acts of torture does not depend on the prior existence of a request for his extradition’.⁴¹ Similarly, and also in the Habré case, the ICJ held in its judgment that ‘Article 7, paragraph 1, requires the State concerned to submit the case to its competent authorities for the purpose of prosecution, irrespective of the existence of a prior extradition request’.⁴²

3.2.1.3 Obligation to Prosecute and Option to Extradite

3.2.1.3.1 Prosecution as an Obligation, Extradition an Option

54 Following the ‘Hague formula’ and as also confirmed by the ICJ in the Habré case, the duty to submit the case to the competent authorities for prosecution is an obligation under the Convention, ‘the violation of which is a wrongful act engaging the responsibility of the State’.⁴³ The only avenue for the forum State to eschew this obligation is to extradite the suspect to a State party, which requests extradition.⁴⁴ Only if such an extradition request has been received, the forum State can choose between submitting the case to its own competent authorities for the purpose of prosecution, or replying favorably to the extradition request and transferring the suspect to the requesting State.⁴⁵ If no extradition request is received, the forum State has no other avenue available than to submit the case to its own competent authorities for prosecution.

55 Importantly, it remains at the discretion of the forum State whether it wants to domestically prosecute the case or extradite the alleged torturer. For example, a request for extradition by a State party having jurisdiction under Article 5(1) does not supersede the forum State’s ability to prosecute under Article 5(2). Similarly, a State party intending to prosecute an alleged torturer under the (active or passive) nationality principle (5(1)(b) and (c)) is under no legal obligation to respond favorably to an extradition request from a State party having jurisdiction under the territoriality principle (Article 5(1)(a))

⁴¹ Suleymane Guengueng et al v Senegal, No 181/2001 (n 8) para 9.7.

⁴² ICJ Reports 2012 422 (n 24) paras 90, 94.

⁴⁴ See also below §§ 61–64 on the ‘third alternative’ to transfer alleged torturers to international criminal tribunals for prosecution.

(and vice versa). Such an obligation for extradition would only exist if an order of priority among the different grounds of jurisdiction in Article 5 had been established in the Convention. This is however not the case.⁴⁶

3.2.1.3.2 Limitations to Option to Extradite

56 The option to extradite is, however, only available if extradition would be in accordance with international law. Even if an extradition request has been received, the option of extradition is de facto not available in cases which contravene the non-refoulement principle as stipulated in Article 3 CAT. Whenever there are 'substantial grounds for believing that [the alleged torturer] would be in danger of being subjected to torture' in the State seeking extradition, the forum State is under an obligation not to extradite.⁴⁷ In addition, States parties to the Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (CCPR) or regional human rights treaties would also have to take into account the prohibition to extradite to a State in which there is a substantial risk of being subjected to other forms of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.⁴⁸ In addition, under the ruling of the Human Rights Committee in Judge v Canada, a forum State that has abolished the death penalty would not be allowed to extradite a suspected torturer to a State where he or she would be in danger of being sentenced to death and/or executed.⁴⁹ Other limitations on extradition can be derived from the right of the accused to privacy and family life as stipulated in Article 17 CCPR,⁵⁰ from the right to a fair trial as stipulated in Article 14 CCPR and Article 7(3) CAT, from procedural safeguards contained in Article 13 CCPR, or from specific provisions restricting extradition in the respective bilateral and multilateral extradition treaties.

57 Should the extradition request originate from a State which actually may seek to protect the alleged torturer from prosecution rather than to prosecute him or her (for example, a State known for the systematic practice of torture seeks extradition of one of its officials who is alleged to have committed acts of torture by the forum State), the forum

The authors of this commentary do not share this view. State shall also not reply positively to the extradition request. In such a case, the latter shall submit the case to its own competent authorities for the purpose of prosecution, unless another State party with jurisdiction under Article 5(1) and a credible commitment to prosecute the suspect seeks his or her extradition. Similarly, should the extradition request be forwarded by a State which is credibly committed to prosecute the alleged perpetrator, but unlikely to dispose of the judicial and administrative capacity to effectively conduct the required prosecution, the forum State shall also refrain from extraditing.⁵¹ Pursuing with extradition in these cases would run counter to the object and purpose of the Convention which is to end impunity for acts of torture and is hence no permissible option for the forum State.

3.2.1.3.3 Failure to Prosecute Turns Option to Extradite Into an Obligation

58 The rationale behind the 'aut dedere, aut judicare' formula contained in Article 7 is to ensure that there are no safe havens for individuals responsible for acts of torture which would allow them to go unpunished. Crucially, this also implies that the failure to submit a case to the competent authorities for domestic prosecution results in the transformation of the option to extradite into an obligation to extradite (provided that an request has been received and extradition would be according to international law). In the seminal Guengueng et al v Senegal case, the CAT Committee had found Senegal to be in breach of its obligation to submit Hissène Habré to its competent authorities for prosecution. Importantly, in addition it concluded that by refusing to comply with the 2005 extradition request of Belgium, 'the State party has again failed to perform its obligations under article 7 of the Convention'.⁵² This does not mean that the Committee found an obligation to extradite per se, but an obligation to take a decision in accordance with the principle aut dedere aut judicare in Article 7 aimed at bringing Hissène Habré to justice, either before Senegal's own courts or by extraditing him to Belgium. In other words, if the forum State, on the basis of its domestic laws, is not willing or not able to prosecute a suspected torturer, the choice between extradition and prosecution turns into a legal obligation to extradite, provided that such extradition is in accordance with international law.

3.2.1.3.4 Practical Order between Prosecution and Extradition

59 As stated above,⁵³ the Convention does not stipulate any hierarchy between the different forms of jurisdiction under Article 5. This also implies that there is no formal hierarchy between domestic prosecution and the option to extradite. The forum State is free to either prosecute or extradite. However, this does not mean that the forum State should not seriously consider any genuine extradition request from another State. Extradition as a form of mutual judicial assistance is usually regulated by bilateral or multilateral extradition treaties. In order to facilitate the extradition of suspected perpetrators of torture, Article 8 contains different provisions, including the assumption that torture is included as an extraditable offence in existing extradition treaties between States parties and that the Convention shall be considered as the legal basis for extradition in the absence of a respective extradition treaty.⁵⁴

⁵¹ The ILC refers to a 'State with the necessary jurisdiction and capability to prosecute the suspect': see ILC (n 26) para 17.

60 From a practical point of view, there are several reasons why a prosecution in the territorial state might be preferable to a prosecution in the State with jurisdiction under Article 5(2). In most cases, prosecution in the territorial state can facilitate more effective investigations, among others, due to easier evidence collection and access to witnesses. Language barriers and different cultural norms might further complicate prosecution in the forum state. The overall administrative and financial burden is likely to be lower in cases in which prosecution takes place in the State where the crime was committed rather than in a State which might be far away from the actual locus delicti. Although Article 9 requires States 'to afford one another the greatest measure of assistance [. . .] including the supply of all evidence at the disposal necessary for proceedings', this requirement may not fully offset the distinct challenges of prosecution by the forum State.⁵⁵

3.2.1.4 'Third alternative': Transfer to International Tribunals

61 Traditionally, and as described above, the principle of aut dedere aut judicare has provided States with two alternatives: submitting the case to the State's competent authorities for the purpose of prosecution or extradition. With the creation of the International Criminal Court (ICC) and various international ad hoc criminal tribunals, new institutions have been emerging which may, however, offer States recourse to a 'third alternative': surrendering the suspect to a competent international or regional criminal court. This development was recognized by the ILC in its report on the obligation to extradite or prosecute⁵⁶, in which it highlights the pertaining innovation in the 2006 International Convention for the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance (CED). Article 11(1) CED explicitly provides for the obligation to prosecute or extradite and reads almost identical to Article 7(1) CAT. Importantly though, it additionally stipulates the State party's option to 'surrender [the suspect] to an international criminal tribunal whose jurisdiction it has recognized', if it wishes not to extradite him or her to another state or submit the case to its competent authorities for the purpose of contribution.⁵⁷

62 With regard to CAT, the emergence of this 'third alternative' contributes to the overall purpose of Article 5(2) and Article 7(1), which is to close safe havens for torturers. Provided that the necessary safeguards for the suspect are in place, and that the proceedings ensure an effective prosecution, the surrender of a suspect to an international criminal court serves the same purpose and is an alternative equivalent to the extradition of a suspect to a state with jurisdiction under Article 5(1). Against this background it would be misleading to argue that the omission of the third alternative from the text of Article 7(1) in the Convention would bar States parties from using this avenue when aiming to bring suspected torturers to justice. While the teleological reading of the Convention favors the inclusion of international criminal courts into the scope of Article 7(1) because of its contribution to close safe havens, there is also nothing in the travaux préparatoires or the jurisprudence of the Committee against Torture⁵⁸ that would preclude such an inclusion. In all likelihood, the omission of international criminal courts as an option from Article 7(1) is due to the absence of such courts at the time when the draft of the Convention was discussed, and hence not considered by its drafters.

⁵⁶ The ILC suggests 'that in light of the increasing significance of international criminal tribunals, new treaty provisions on the obligation to extradite or prosecute should include this third alternative, as should national legislation': see ILC (n 26) para 27–29.

63 The interpretation favoring an inclusion of the third alternative is in fact already confirmed by practice of States parties surrendering suspects to the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY).⁵⁹ Furthermore, and more recently in the Hissène Habré case, Senegal established the Extraordinary African Chambers (EAC), which are located in Senegal, but qualify as a hybrid court featuring domestic as well as international elements. Only a month after the ICJ had rendered its judgment in June 2012 and found Senegal in continuous breach of Article 7(1), Senegal and the African Union signed an agreement establishing the EAC for the purpose of prosecuting Hissène Habré.⁶⁰ The Chambers were mandated to conduct the investigation, prosecution as well as appeals stage, form part of the Senegalese Court system and comprise two Senegalese judges as well as one Burkinabe judge, who was appointed by the African Union. The EAC's proceedings were carried out under the Senegalese Code of Criminal Proceedings. It is for this reason that some do not consider the EAC as actually falling under the 'third alternative', but rather qualify as a form of prosecution by the competent domestic authorities. Accordingly, 'it is Senegal that will be prosecuting Habré, with some international assistance, and this will be in accordance with its mandate from the African Union as well as its obligation under CAT and in accordance with the judgment of the ICJ'.⁶¹ With this kind of set-up the EAC resemble previous internationalized or hybrid courts such as the Extraordinary Chambers in the Court of Cambodia, the Special Court for Sierra Leone, or the Special Tribunal for Lebanon. But even if one were to consider the EAC as falling outside of the scope of domestic Senegalese realm, for example due to their prosecution of Habré 'on behalf of the African Union', and rather qualify them as a form of internationalized criminal tribunals, this would not amount to a breach of Senegal's obligation under the Convention. Regarding the scope of the obligation to prosecute, the ILC in its report on the obligation to prosecute or extradite refers directly to the—then already established—EAC and refers to them as an example for a 'third alternative'⁶² and does not indicate any reservations towards them. Directly pertaining to the permissibility of the EAC under the Convention, ICJ's Judge Xue notes in her dissenting opinion to the Habré judgment, published prior to the establishment of the Chambers, that even if the AU ultimately decides to establish a special tribunal for the trial of Mr. Habré, Senegal's surrender to such a tribunal could not be regarded as a breach of its obligation under Article 7, paragraph 1, because such a tribunal is created precisely to fulfil the object and purpose of the Convention; neither the terms of the Convention nor the State practice in this regard prohibit such an option.⁶³

64 Habré was indicted on 2 July 2013 before the EAC. The trial started in July 2015, in the course of which also the testimonies of 69 victims were heard. On 27 April 2017, the Appeals Chamber of the EAC eventually rendered its final judgment and found Hissène Habré guilty of crimes against humanity, war crimes, and torture, and sentenced him to life imprisonment. Victims of torture, among others, who had joined the trial as civil party were awarded a reparation of fifteen million FCFA (approx. 25,000 USD).⁶⁴

3.2.1.5 Time for the Performance of Obligations under Article 7(1)

65 Under Article 7 the question may also arise how swiftly a State party has to submit a case to its competent authorities for the purpose of prosecution. While Article 6(2) requires the State party to ‘immediately make a preliminary inquiry into the facts’ the Convention does not provide any specific period within which the performance of the obligations under Article 7(1) is required.

66 In some cases, for example, in those which are particularly sensitive from a foreign policy perspective, the forum State might have a political preference for extradition in order to avoid domestic prosecution and the potentially entailed political fallout. The forum State might therefore be tempted to wait and hope to receive an extradition request to which it can respond favorably. The text of the Convention does not provide any explicit period of time for how long the forum State can wait to receive an extradition request and continue to postpone the initiation of its own prosecution. The forum State therefore has a certain discretion to decide at what stage it can conclude that no extradition request was received. This discretion, however, must be reasonable and cannot be used to excessively defer prosecution, under the pretext that the forum State would still wait for an extradition request. Such a deferral would be inconsistent with the general purpose of the Convention and amount to a breach of the forum State’s obligation under Article 7(1).⁶⁵

67 Instructively, Senegal argued in the Habré case both before the Committee against Torture as well as the ICJ that it was in principle committed to perform its obligations under the Convention, including Article 7.⁶⁶ However, due to legislative as well as financial challenges, Senegal argued, it had not yet been able to prosecute or extradite Habré. Hence, according to Senegal, the non-performance of its obligations under Article 7 were not to constitute a violation, but a delay of the Convention’s implementation.

68 Before the Committee against Torture, Senegal argued that the Convention against Torture would be not self-executing and therefore requiring domestic implementation legislation.⁶⁷ This process would take time, given the complexity of the matter and Senegal’s state capacity. Consequently, it would be wrong to conclude that Senegal would not apply Article 7. Due to the pending implementation of the required domestic legislation and in the absence of an extradition request in 2001 when the complaint had been submitted, the competent authorities were, according to Senegal, unable to initiate any prosecution. Consequently, 'the presence in Senegal of Hissène Habré cannot itself justify the proceedings brought against him'⁶⁸ and therefore Senegal would not breach its obligation under the Convention. Furthermore, following the extradition request from Belgium in 2005, the Dakar Court of Appeals argued that in the absence of the necessary jurisdiction, it would be unable to decide on Belgium's request.⁶⁹

69 Rebuking Senegal's line of reasoning, the Committee against Torture made it clear in its decision that a State party cannot evoke the complexity of its own judicial proceedings or other reasons stemming from domestic law to justify its failure to comply with the obligations under the Convention.⁷⁰ Hence, Senegal was obliged to prosecute Habré for alleged acts of torture unless it could show that there was not sufficient evidence to prosecute, at least at the time when the applicants submitted their complaint in Dakar in January 2000. With the Court of Cassation's judgment in 2001 this avenue was, however, closed.⁷¹ Therefore, and irrespective of the time, which had passed since the submission of the complaint, the Committee decided that Senegal not only violated its obligations under Article 5(2) to establish the required jurisdiction, but also violated its obligation under Article 7 of the Convention to submit the case to its competent authorities for prosecution.⁷²

70 Similarly, the ICJ considered in the Habré case the arguments brought forward by Senegal in order to justify why Habré had not been prosecuted or extradited. Senegal's suggestion that it had been embroiled in a lengthy and complex process of legal reform until 2007 in order to establish jurisdiction in conformity with Article 5(2) and that it had hence not been in the position to submit the case to its competent authorities as required under Article 7(1) was rejected by the Court. The ICJ argued that the failure to initiate proceedings under Article 7(1) cannot be justified with the lack of domestic legislation.⁷³ Referring to Article 27 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, which reflects customary law, the Court held that domestic law cannot be invoked to justify a non-performance of obligations undertaken in an international treaty such as those included in Article 7 CAT.⁷⁴

⁷² Suleymane Guengueng et al v Senegal, No 181/2001 (n 8) para 9.9.

⁷³ Although the ICJ did not explicitly decide in its judgment on whether Senegal had been in breach of its obligation under Article 5 due to procedural reasons, its decision on Article 7(1) implied that Senegal was in breach of its obligations under Article 5 from 1987 until as late as 2007. See ICJ Reports 2012 422 (n 24) para 113. The Court declared Belgium's request to rule on Senegal's failure to implement legislation in line with Article 5 inadmissible since, by the time the application has been filed, Senegal had already reformed its legal framework and the dispute between Belgium and Senegal on this matter had ended. The presence of a dispute between the parties is a precondition for admissibility. See also Separate Opinion of Judge Cançado Trindade: '... The conduct of the State ought to be one which is conducive to compliance with the obligations of result (in the cas d'espèce, the proscription of torture). The State cannot allege that, despite its good conduct, insufficiencies or difficulties of domestic law rendered it impossible the full compliance with its obligation (to outlaw torture and to prosecute perpetrators of it); and the Court cannot consider a case terminated, given the allegedly 'good conduct' of the State concerned': see ICJ Reports 2012 422 (n 24) 508, para 50 (Separate Opinion of Judge Cançado Trindade); see above Art 5, §§ 109ff.

71 Furthermore, the ICJ noted that although the Convention does not provide any specific time period within which the performance of the obligations under Article 7(1) is required, 'it is necessarily implicit in the text [of the Convention] that [the obligation] must be implemented within a reasonable time, in a manner compatible with the object and purpose of the Convention',⁷⁵ with the latter aimed 'to make more effective the struggle against torture'.⁷⁶ From this the Court inferred, that proceedings should be undertaken 'without delay'.⁷⁷ Consequently, the Court concluded that Senegal had breached and remained in breach of its obligations under Article 7(1). Similar to the ruling of the Committee against Torture in Guengueng et al v Senegal, this breach was ruled to be distinct from Senegal's (non)performance of its obligations under Article 5(2), which the ICJ did not consider on procedural grounds. The ICJ concluded that Senegal was in violation of Article 7(1) before and after Senegal's legal reforms in 2005 by which it established the jurisdiction as required under Article 5(2).

72 Regarding the period after 2005, and on why no prosecution of Mr. Habré had been initiated despite the then available legal framework, Senegal maintained before the ICJ that it always had the intention to comply with its obligations under Article 7(1), however, that it was depending on financial assistance in order to initiate a trial as required by the African Union in its decision of 2006.⁷⁸ Furthermore, Senegal argued that the 2010 judgement of the ECOWAS Court of Justice demanded further major reforms of the domestic legal framework, which would require time and hence contribute to the delay in performing its obligations under the Convention.⁷⁹ However, both objections were rejected by the ICJ. It held that financial difficulties do not justify the failure to initiate proceedings against Hissène Habré, even if Senegal denies that financial difficulties were brought forward to circumvent its obligations under the Convention against Torture.⁸⁰ Furthermore, Senegal's duty to comply with its obligations under the Convention cannot be affected by the decision of the ECOWAS Court of Justice.⁸¹

73 Senegal was therefore ordered to take without further delay all necessary measures and submit the case for prosecution, unless it acceded to Belgium's extradition request.⁸² However, the ICJ did in its judgment not expressly consider Belgium's request to declare that Senegal must extradite Habré 'to Belgium without further ado' should it not prosecute. It hence did not address the question whether Senegal had also violated a duty to extradite following its failure to prosecute.⁸³

3.2.1.6 Temporal Scope of Obligation to Prosecute

74 When deliberating the Habré case, the ICJ also had to decide on the temporal scope of the duty to prosecute in the context of aut dedere aut judicare. Habré ruled Chad from 1982 to 1990 and Senegal ratified the Convention against Torture in 1986 and became ⁸³ See the Separate Opinion of Judge Skotnikov, for whom the lack of a specific response to Belgium's demand for extradition is not due to the different nature of the duty to prosecute and the option to extradite, but due to the Court's consideration of Belgium's application on the basis of an erga omnes partes obligation rather than on the basis of Belgium as an injured party. According to Skotnikov the Court's decision not to pronounce on the question whether Belgium has a special interest in Senegal's compliance with the Convention led to the 'inevitable implication ... that the issue of the validity of Belgium's request for extradition remains unresolved': see ICJ Reports 2012 422 (n 24) 481, para 8; see also ibid. 559, paras 19–22 (Separate Opinion of Judge Yusuf).

subsequently party to it in 1987 when the treaty entered into force. Consequently, the question arose whether Senegal's obligation to prosecute under Article 7 would also comprise alleged crimes committed before 1986 or 1987.

75 In its pertaining deliberations on the temporal scope the Court highlighted the difference between the prohibition of torture and the obligation to prosecute. Importantly, and for the first time in its history, the Court held that the prohibition of torture is part of customary international law and has become a peremptory norm (jus cogens). This status finds its basis in the widespread international practice and on the opinio juris of States.⁸⁴

76 In contrast, however, the Court sees the obligation to prosecute alleged torturers as required by Article 7 CAT only arising with the treaty's entry into force. Drawing on Article 28 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties,⁸⁵ which reflects customary law, the Court concluded that nothing in the Convention against Torture reveals an intention to require a State party to criminalize, under Article 4, acts of torture that took place prior to its entry into force for that State, or to establish its jurisdiction over such acts in accordance with Article 5. Consequently, in the view of the Court, the obligation to prosecute, under Article 7, paragraph 1, of the Convention does not apply to such acts.⁸⁶

77 Accordingly, Senegal was obliged only from the date of the Convention's entry into force (26 June 1987) onwards to establish the jurisdiction required by Article 5(2), to start a preliminary inquiry according to Article 6(2), and to submit the case to its authorities for prosecution or decide to extradite in accordance with Article 7(1). Those crimes which were allegedly committed by Hissène Habré from the beginning of his regime in 1982 until the entry into force of the Convention in 1987 fall outside of the temporal scope of the duty to prosecute under the Convention.⁸⁷

78 The ICJ referred in its judgment to the Committee against Torture's decision in the case of OR, MM and MS v Argentina.⁸⁸ In it, the Committee had to decide on a complaint under Article 22 which was submitted by relatives of victims killed by Argentinian militaries in 1976. The Committee held that 'torture for the purpose of the Convention can only mean torture that occurs subsequent to the entry into force of the Convention' and decided the complaint to be inadmissible ratione temporis.⁸⁹

79 Importantly, though, while there is no obligation for the State party arising from the Convention regarding crimes committed before its entry into force, the ICJ also notes in its judgment 'that nothing in that instrument prevents it from doing so'.⁹⁰ This is noteworthy as it suggests that the ICJ has no objections regarding a retroactive application of the Convention against Torture. The Statue of the EAC, which were created in the wake of the ICJ judgment in the Habré case on the basis of an agreement between Senegal and the African Union, does provide jurisdiction for international crimes committed during the entire period of Hissène Habré's rule (1982 to 1990).⁹¹ Hence, its temporal scope covers years which precede the temporal scope of the Convention.⁹²

⁸⁶ See ICJ Reports 2012 422 (n 24) para 100.

3.3 Article 7(2): Procedural Safeguards in Case of Prosecution

80 The rationale for the inclusion of Article 7(2) finds its origin in the discussions during the drafting process on the principle of universal jurisdiction as eventually stipulated in Article 5(2). Some States expressed their concern that universal jurisdiction would be prone to be abused for political reasons, could result in trials on the basis of spurious accusations, fabricated evidence, and lead to frictions between States.⁹³ The inclusion of procedural safeguards as entailed in Article 7(2) was meant to allay these fears and to eventually reach a consensus.

81 Once the forum State has decided not to extradite—either due to a preference for domestic prosecution or the absence of a valid extradition request—it has to submit the case to the ‘competent authorities’, for example to the prosecutor, in order for them to decide whether to investigate and prosecute the alleged torturer.⁹⁴ According to the first sentence of Article 7(2), this decision has to be taken ‘in the same manner as in the case of any ordinary offence of a serious nature under the law of that State’. Hence, whenever the competent authorities of a State party are tasked to decide whether to initiate a prosecution in relation to torture, the ‘normal procedures relating to serious offences as well as the normal standards of evidence shall be applied’.⁹⁵ This requirement arises irrespective under which ground of jurisdiction the case has been placed.

82 Initiating proceedings outside of the territorial State may frequently be confronted with a lack of evidence. The forum State shall also apply to the territorial or national State pursuant to Article 9(1) to supply all evidence at their disposal necessary for the proceedings. If these States are not able or willing to supply the necessary evidence, the forum State shall reconsider its decision to prosecute and choose, as far as possible, the option of extradition to these States. It may even delay the proceedings for a reasonable time in order to negotiate a proper solution with other State(s) concerned. If these efforts fail as well, the strict procedural standards of Article 7(2) might even require the forum State to stop the criminal proceedings and to release the suspected torturer.

83 The second sentence of Article 7(2) demands that ‘the standards of evidence required for prosecution and conviction’ in universal jurisdiction cases shall in no way be ‘less stringent’ than those which apply to cases prosecuted and tried under other grounds of jurisdiction stipulated in Article 5(1). The purpose is to safeguard against an unjustifiable ‘lowering of the bar’ allowing for an arbitrary, for example politically motivated, resort to universal jurisdiction. Although the principle of universal jurisdiction has been regarded as an essential element in making the Convention an effective instrument, it should not contribute to prosecutions and convictions on the basis of insufficient or inadequate evidence.⁹⁶

⁹³ See above § 32 and Art 5 §§ 37, 38.

⁹⁵ Burgers and Danelius (n 30) 138.

84 While not explicitly stated it would be similarly impermissible to ‘raise the bar’ in universal jurisdiction cases and require standards of evidence which exceed those of cases under other grounds of jurisdiction. Raising the required standards of evidence to an unduly restrictive level could be taken by the forum State as a tempting escape route in cases in which no extradition request has been received but prosecution is considered not desirable for example due to the political sensitivity of the case. Such an application of more stringent requirements for universal jurisdiction would result in the decision not to prosecute and try suspected torturers, and hence also contribute to impunity and run counter to the purpose of the Convention. The failure of the competent authorities, for example the prosecutor, to perform his or her duties of bringing a torturer to justice may amount to a violation by the respective State party of its obligations under Article 4, as established by the Committee against Torture in the case of Guridi v Spain.⁹⁷

3.4 Article 7(3): Right of the Alleged Torturer to Fair Treatment

85 Article 7(3) stipulates that any person regarding whom proceedings are brought in connection with any of the offences referred to in Article 4 shall be guaranteed fair treatment at all stages of the proceedings. The provision to guarantee ‘fair treatment at all stages of the proceedings’ appeared initially as Article 6(5) in the revised Swedish draft, however, in 1981 the Working Group decided to move the paragraph to Article 7.

86 During the deliberations of the Working Group in 1981, the Netherlands proposed to specify and therefore to limit the scope of the Article to ‘guarantees of a fair and equitable trial’.⁹⁸ However, this proposal was eventually not incorporated into the Swedish draft or the final version of Article 7(3) which explicitly requires fair treatment at ‘all stages of the proceedings’. Hence, the obligation to guarantee fair treatment to a person regarding whom proceedings are brought in connection with the offences referred to in Article 4 arises already with the arrest or a less intrusive measure imposed in accordance with Article 6(1). The obligation of Article 7(3) continues through all stages of the criminal investigation up to the extradition proceedings and/or the criminal trial. During interrogation, the alleged torturer, of course, should not be subjected to any torture, cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment. During custody, he or she must enjoy the right to habeas corpus and other minimum rights of persons deprived of liberty as stipulated in Article 9 CCPR. During the extradition procedure, he or she has the right under Article 13 CCPR to submit reasons against such extradition and to enjoy all other procedural rights stipulated in bilateral or multilateral extradition treaties. In particular, he or she shall not be extradited to a country where there exists a serious risk of torture or ill-treatment. In deciding whether to extradite or prosecute, the forum State shall also take into account whether the accused will enjoy a fair trial in the State which requested his or her extradition. Finally, during the criminal trial, the suspected torturer must enjoy all the guarantees of a fair trial as stipulated in Article 14 CCPR.⁹⁹

87 The obligation for a fair treatment as enshrined in Article 7(3) partly overlaps with the obligations stipulated in Article 12 and 13; however, there are important differences. Article 12 requires the State party to initiate ex officio a prompt and impartial investigation whenever there is a reasonable ground to believe that an act of torture has been committed.¹⁰⁰ In contrast to Article 7(3), this obligation includes cases where the identity and the whereabouts of the perpetrator is not known, but is limited to cases where the crime was perpetrated on the territory under the jurisdiction of the State party. Similarly, Article 13 stipulates the right to have complaints promptly and impartially investigated by the State party's competent authorities, but only in relation to cases where the crime was perpetrated on the territory under the jurisdiction of the State party.¹⁰¹ The obligation to guarantee fair treatment under Article 7(3) goes beyond cases perpetrated on the territory under the State party's jurisdiction and covers all grounds of jurisdictions stipulated in Article 5.¹⁰² Article 7(3) applies to 'any of the offences referred to in Article 4', including acts of torture, attempts to commit torture, and the complicity or participation in torture. Its scope is in no way contingent on the jurisdictional ground under which the proceedings are initiated.

1. Introduction

1 The purpose of the Convention of avoiding safe havens for torturers can best be achieved by a clear obligation of the forum State to prosecute any suspected perpetrator of torture present in any territory under its jurisdiction and by facilitating the possibility of extradition from the forum State to the territorial or national State.¹

¹ See above Arts 5, 6, and 7.

Article 8 seeks to achieve the second aim by removing, as far as possible, legal obstacles to extradition. It establishes an obligation to treat torture as an extraditable offence in bilateral or multilateral extradition treaties between States parties and an obligation to recognize torture as an extraditable offence in domestic law. In addition, Article 8 authorizes States parties to consider the Convention as a legal basis for extradition and establishes a legal presumption of equality between the principles of territoriality and nationality.

4. Such offences shall be treated, for the purpose of extradition between States Parties, as if they had been committed not only in the place in which they occurred but also in the territories of the States required to establish their jurisdiction in accordance with article 5, paragraph 1.

2.2 Analysis of Working Group Discussions

7 Given that some States can only extradite a person on the basis of a treaty obligation to this effect, Sweden considered it desirable to make the Convention itself the basis for the extradition of suspected torturers. Provisions to this effect also appear in Article 8 of the 1971 Hague Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Seizure of Aircraft,⁷ Article 8 of the 1971 Montreal Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts against the Safety of Civil Aviation,⁸ Article 8 of the 1973 New York Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of Crimes against Internationally Protected Persons, including Diplomatic Agents,⁹ and Article 10 of the 1979 New York Convention against the Taking of Hostages.¹⁰

8 In comments on specific articles Austria considered that Article 14 of the original Swedish draft and Article X(2) of the IAPL draft were complementary and might accordingly be combined. Austria also felt that the wording ‘may [. . .] extradite’ should be reconsidered and that in the case of an already existing extradition treaty an obligation to extradite should not be superseded by the optional possibility of extraditing as provided in Article 14. Austria was of the opinion that a more stringent obligation might be created, for example by replacing the word ‘may’ by ‘shall’ in that article.

9 The United States proposed that the ‘prosecute or extradite’ provision be modelled on the language used in the Protection of Diplomats Convention. France was of the opinion that ‘if requested’ should be replaced by the words ‘at the request of another State Party’, and that the words ‘in accordance with its legislation’ should be added after the word ‘extradite’. With regard to extradition, the French delegation was of the opinion that the principle of non-extradition for political offences should be maintained and that Article 14 was acceptable because of its flexibility.

10 Switzerland feared that the motives for acts of torture might be such as to permit torturers to invoke the political nature of their actions as an argument against their extradition. It also feared that a State of refuge might be able, for the same reasons, to refuse the extradition of a person charged with torture. The Swiss Government therefore considered it advisable to include in the draft Convention a provision similar to that proposed by the IAPL in its Article XII, to the effect that acts of torture shall not be considered political offences, suggesting that this provision might be included in Article 14 in the form of an additional paragraph reading: ‘For the purposes of this Convention, the acts defined in article [. . .] shall not be deemed to be offences of a political nature.’

⁸ Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts against the Safety of Civil Aviation (adopted 23 September 1971, entered into force 26 January 1973) 974 UNTS 177 (Montreal Convention).

¹⁰ International Convention against the Taking of Hostages (adopted 17 December 1979, entered into force 3 June 1983) 1316 UNTS 205.

11 Finally, the Swiss Government proposed that the provisions on extradition contained in the Swedish Government's draft should be supplemented and strengthened by an additional article which would essentially restate the rules set out in Article 8 of the Hague Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Seizures of Aircraft, of the Montreal Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts against the Safety of Civil Aviation, and of the New York Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of Crimes against Internationally Protected Persons, including Diplomatic Agents. Believing that it would be desirable to include an article establishing a legal basis under the Convention for treating torture as an extraditable offence and detailing the relationship between the Convention and present or future extradition treaties, the United States put forward a proposal analogous to the articles in the Hijacking, Sabotage, and Protection of Diplomats Conventions. After informal consultations and taking into account the proposal by the United States, Sweden submitted its revised draft.¹¹

12 Concerning paragraph 2, there was a difference between delegations as to the choice of the wording 'may' or 'shall'. The Working Group therefore adopted the text proposed by Sweden, including the two alternatives in paragraph 2 which were left for further consideration at a later stage.¹² Although most delegations felt that the verb should read 'shall', some delegations, in particular the United Kingdom and the United States, maintained their position that the verb should read 'may'. The latter position prevailed in 1982.¹³ In their commentary on the travaux préparatoires, Burgers and Danelius expressed a certain disappointment when they stated that 'it remains to be seen to what extent the States concerned will in effect accept the Convention as the basis of extradition'.¹⁴

3. Issues of Interpretation

3.1 Need for Removing Legal Obstacles to Extradition

13 Extradition is the obligatory departure of a person from one State to another, at the request of the latter State, for the purpose of bringing him or her to justice or of implementing a judgment, if the person concerned has already been sentenced and convicted. While expulsion is in the interests of the expelling State for certain purposes, such as national security, public order, the prevention of crime or illegal migration, extradition is in the interest of the requesting State and only for the purpose of criminal justice. Expulsion, extradition, and the involuntary return (refoulement) of a refugee or migrant to his or her country of origin are, in contrast to rendition and similar forms of illegal removal of aliens from one State to another, legal concepts which, if implemented in pursuance of a valid decision reached by a competent authority in accordance with domestic law and respecting the minimum guarantees against arbitrary removals established by international law, a lawful practice between States under international law. Such minimum guarantees include the prohibition of refoulement under Article 3 of the Convention,¹⁵

the protection of privacy and family life under Article 17 CCPR, the right to remain in one's own country under Article 12(4) CCPR, or the procedural rights of aliens to a hearing, an appeal, and proper representation under Article 13 CCPR. In addition to international human rights, refugee, and criminal law, the respective rights and obligations of the requesting and the requested State vis-à-vis each other and in relation to the individual concerned are regulated in various bilateral and multilateral extradition treaties.¹⁶ The decision to expel or extradite an individual to another State is, however, regarded as an essential element of State sovereignty, and States are extremely reluctant to accept any legal obligations to expel or extradite.

14 The Convention is based on the desire to combat impunity for the crime of torture and to eliminate safe havens for torturers. This requires the obligation of all States parties to establish jurisdiction without loopholes as well as their obligation to mutual judicial assistance and willingness to extradite alleged torturers to other States with a more convincing jurisdiction. The main purpose of Article 8 is, therefore, to remove, as far as possible, any legal obstacles to extradition and to create the legal possibility for States parties to extradite alleged torturers to other States parties.¹⁷ The Committee regularly noted with concern State parties' failure to enact legislation complying with these obligations under Article 8.¹⁸

15 The travaux préparatoires reveal two different legal approaches dominating the drafting process. One is represented by Article X of the IAPL draft, which contains an order of priority among various grounds of jurisdiction¹⁹ and an obligation of States parties to extradite the alleged torturer to a State with a stronger jurisdiction. The other is expressed in Article 14 of the original Swedish draft which, rather than establishing a duty to extradite, gives priority to the duty of the State, where the alleged offender is present (the forum State), to prosecute and only provides the forum State with an alternative option, if requested, to extradite. Since this principle of aut dedere aut judicare had already been accepted and developed in a considerable number of anti-terrorism treaties and does not require any legal obligation to extradite, it finally prevailed over the first concept.²⁰

16 The Austrian position²¹ in the Working Group that both legal approaches are complementary and should, therefore, be combined, and which was later maintained as illustrated by the failure of the Austrian authorities to arrest Mr. Al-Duri in 1999,²² overlooked the different philosophies behind these two approaches. The 'prosecution approach' seems more practical insofar as extradition involves a complex and lengthy procedure with many legal obstacles. On the other hand, the 'extradition approach' seems more practical as the territorial or national State usually has better access to evidence than a State exercising jurisdiction under the universality or passive nationality principle. With respect to torture, experience shows, however, that the territorial or national State often has no political interest in prosecuting perpetrators of torture, since they acted in accordance with an explicit State policy or at least with the acquiescence of the Government.

17 The 'extradition approach' demands that all legal obstacles to effective extradition be removed. This can be seen from the attempts in Article X of the IAPL draft to make the Convention a proper legal basis for extradition and to establish the obligation of States parties to recognize torture as an extraditable offence. Article 14 of the original Swedish draft did not contain any similar provisions. Since the 'prosecution approach' of the Swedish draft also recognized the alternative of extradition, it was also essential that the Convention created, as far as possible, the legal possibility to extradite. However, as the majority of the Committee against Torture made clear in its admissibility decision on the case of Rosenmann v Spain, Article 8 does not impose any obligation on a State party to seek an extradition, or to insist on its procurement in the event of a refusal.²³

3.2 Article 8(1): Obligation to Treat Torture as an Extraditable Offence in Extradition Treaties

18 Paragraph 1 of Article 8 corresponds almost literally to Article 8(1) of the Hague Hijacking Convention and deals with the relation between the Convention and any existing or future extradition treaties between States parties, whether bilateral or multilateral.

3.2.1 Relevance for Already Existing Extradition Treaties

19 With respect to already existing extradition treaties between States parties, the first sentence provides that the crime of torture shall be deemed to be included as an extraditable offence in such treaties. Article 8 can thus be regarded as an amendment to existing extradition treaties by adding torture to other extraditable offences, if it was not yet covered by the respective treaty. If a given extradition treaty contains a certain list of extraditable offences, the fact that torture is not included shall no longer constitute an obstacle to extradition between States which are parties to both the respective extradition treaty and the Convention. As amendments must be agreed to by all States parties, Article 8(1) has no effect on extradition treaties between States parties to the Convention and non-State parties. If a State which is not a party to the Convention requests from another State which is a party to the Convention, on the basis of their bilateral extradition treaty, which does not include torture as an extraditable offence, the extradition of an alleged torturer who is a national of the requesting State, the requested State must refuse the extradition for lack of a proper legal basis. As soon as the requesting State ratifies the Convention, the requested State is entitled to extradite the person concerned. With respect to multilateral extradition treaties, the relevant provisions must be read differently in relation to States parties and non-State parties.

3.2.2 Relevance for Future Extradition Treaties

20 With regard to future extradition treaties between States parties, the second sentence of Article 8(1) establishes the obligation explicitly to include the crime of torture as an extraditable offence. This is a clear obligation of result in relation to bilateral treaties. For example, in 1997, the Committee congratulated Argentina on bilateral treaties on extradition and judicial assistance recently concluded by the State party which 'contained provisions consistent with Article 8 of the Convention'.²⁴ With respect to multilateral treaties, the question seems to be less clear. If such treaties are concluded by States parties to the Convention only, the obligation is the same as with respect to bilateral treaties. But if non-State parties to the Convention are parties to such treaties, the obligation of members to the Convention can only be interpreted as an obligation of conduct, ie as an obligation to make a particular effort to convince the others that torture should be included as an extraditable offence. Since the Torture Convention has already been ratified by more than 140 States from all world regions, the risk is fairly small that States parties would be in the minority when a new multilateral extradition treaty is drafted. In reality, most of the modern extradition treaties actually do contain torture as an extraditable offence.²⁵

3.3 Article 8(2): Authorization to Consider the Convention as Legal Basis for Extradition

21 There are different legal traditions regarding extradition. Some States make extradition conditional on the existence of an extradition treaty with the requesting State. In order to avoid States parties to the Convention having to negotiate extradition treaties with all other States parties, the IAPL draft provided in Article X(2) that States parties undertake to extradite on the basis of this Convention. This proposal was taken up in the US draft which, however, changed this obligation into a mere authorization. The formulation that the State party 'may, at its option, consider this Convention as the legal basis for extradition [...]' was taken from Article 8(2) of the Hague Hijacking Convention. In the Working Group, there was a difference of opinion whether to use the word 'may' or 'shall'.²⁶ While most delegations felt that the verb should read 'shall', the final wording of Article 8 retained the word 'may'.²⁷

22 In practice, this difference is not as important as it may seem. Under the system of universal jurisdiction adopted under the Convention, States parties have no obligation to extradite.²⁸ If a State party which makes extradition conditional on the existence of a treaty receives from another State party with which it has no extradition treaty a request for extradition of an alleged torturer, it has the choice between prosecution and extradition in accordance with Article 7. If it prefers, for whatever reason, to extradite the person, it may consider Article 8(2) CAT as the legal basis. The word 'shall' would therefore not change much. Even if it was under the legal obligation to consider the Convention as a legal basis for the extradition, it could nevertheless refuse the extradition request and proceed with prosecution.

23 The last sentence of Article 8(2) confirms that extradition is, in principle, a matter of State sovereignty. Apart from the fact that the requested State has the choice whether or not to extradite, it also has the right to establish further conditions and regulate the procedure to be applied in extradition cases. These rules must comply with the relevant conditions of international law, including the non-refoulement principle.

24 In its consideration of State reports, the Committee against Torture repeatedly took up the issue of extradition proceedings and encouraged States parties to introduce or simplify the provisions within national law regulating extradition.²⁹ In 2004, the Committee noted with appreciation New Zealand's adoption of the 1999 Extradition Act which reflected previous recommendations of the Committee³⁰ and provides for the extradition to non-Commonwealth countries without the basis of an extradition treaty.³¹ Similarly, in 1993, members of the Committee wished to receive further information about the application of mutual judicial assistance between Canada and other States, especially with regard to the offence of torture, where no bilateral agreement existed. The representative indicated in response that Canada could cooperate with another country in accordance with those articles regardless of whether bilateral treaties on mutual legal assistance existed. As an example of how the procedure of mutual legal assistance was applied in practice, information was supplied on the assistance given by Canada at the request of Chile in connection with a torture-related prosecution there.³²

3.4 Article 8(3): Obligation to Recognize Torture as an Extraditable Offence in Domestic Law

25 Those States parties which do not make extradition conditional on the existence of an extradition treaty can, in the absence of such a treaty, decide on the basis of their domestic legislation which type of offences they consider as extraditable. Article 8(3) establishes an obligation on States parties to include the crime of torture as an extraditable offence in domestic law, at least vis-à-vis other States parties. This obligation corresponds almost literally to Article 8(3) of the Hague Hijacking Convention and was introduced into the drafting of the Convention by Article X(3) of the IAPL draft and the US draft. However, the fact that torture must be recognized as an extraditable offence does not create any obligation on the forum State to extradite in a particular case. It remains free to decide whether or not to extradite an alleged torturer, whose extradition is requested by another State party, and to establish particular conditions for extradition as well as to regulate the extradition procedure. But a State party would violate Article 8(3) if it refuses the extradition of an alleged torturer on the ground that its domestic law does not recognize torture as an extraditable offence. In this regard, the Committee remarked critically in relation to Sierra Leone's initial State report that the State party's Extradition Act did not include as required under Article 8(3) the crimes stipulated in Article 4 of the Convention. Furthermore, Sierra Leone had not clarified whether it indeed invoked the Convention against Torture when conducting extradition to States with which it did not entertain an extradition treaty.³³

3.5 Article 8(4): Presumption of Equality between the Principles of Territoriality and Nationality

26 In some extradition treaties and domestic laws, a condition for extradition is that the offence has been committed in the territory of the requesting State. In other words, if the State of which the alleged perpetrator or the victim of torture is a national establishes jurisdiction in accordance with Article 5(1)(b) or (c) and requests from the territorial State or from a State party intending to exercise universal jurisdiction the extradition of the alleged offender, the requested State might have to refuse extradition because of such a territorial clause in its domestic law or an applicable extradition treaty. In order to remove this legal obstacle, Article 8(4) establishes the legal presumption that the offence of torture shall be treated as if it was committed in the territory of the State which exercises jurisdiction on the basis of the active or passive nationality principle.

27 This legal presumption is modelled on Article 8(4) of the Hague Hijacking Convention and was proposed for inclusion in the Convention by the US draft. Burgers and Danelius raise doubts as to whether this presumption also applies to the passive nationality principle in view of the fact that no State party is required to exercise jurisdiction in accordance with Article 5(1)(c). Overall, however, they conclude that Article 8(4) also applies to such cases.³⁴

28 Again, one should stress that nothing in this paragraph requires the forum State to extradite a certain person suspected of having committed the crime of torture. As with the other provisions in Article 8, it is only intended to remove legal obstacles contained in domestic law or in extradition treaties and to provide the legal possibility to use extradition as a legal and practical alternative to prosecution.

3.3 Article 9(2): Conformity with Treaties on Mutual Judicial Assistance	306

1. Introduction

1 Articles 4 to 9 aim at avoiding safe havens for torturers by requiring States parties to criminalize torture (Article 4) and to establish different types of jurisdiction for the criminal offence of torture, including universal jurisdiction on the basis of the principle aut dedere aut judicare (Articles 5(2) and 7), as well as by obliging the forum State, ie any State party on the territory of which a suspected torturer is present, to take him or her into custody, carry out a preliminary inquiry of the facts, and to proceed either to prosecution or extradition (Articles 6 and 7). These principle obligations are facilitated by removing legal obstacles to extradition (Article 8) and by requiring States parties to afford each other the greatest measure of mutual judicial assistance (Article 9). In particular, the State in which the act of torture has been committed (the territorial State) and the State of which the suspected torturer is a citizen (the national State) are under an obligation to provide the forum State with all the evidence needed to proceed with the prosecution.

2.2 Analysis of Working Group Discussions

7 In written comments based on Article 15 of the original Swedish draft, the United States suggested specifying, as had been done in other international conventions, that when supplying evidence, the law of the State requested shall apply and proposed a re-draft of the original Swedish draft.⁶ The French delegation suggested that the phrase ‘the greatest measure of assistance in connection with proceedings’ be replaced by the phrase ‘the greatest measure of assistance in all criminal proceedings’ and that paragraph 2 of the Article should follow the lines of the relevant provisions of the Hague Hijacking Convention (Article 10(2)) and the Montreal Civil Aviation Convention (Article 11(2)). Accordingly, Article 15 of the original Swedish draft was reworded and became Article 9 of the revised Swedish draft. As a result of discussions in the Working Group in 1982,⁷ paragraph 2 of Article 9 was redrafted, and the whole Article, in its modified form, was adopted by the Working Group.⁸

3. Issues of Interpretation

3.1 Obligation to Provide Judicial Assistance to the Forum State

8 The Convention is based on the principle that States parties shall establish jurisdiction to try alleged torturers present in their territories. If the forum State has no link to the territory where the crime of torture was committed or to the nationality of the perpetrator or the victim, it nevertheless has the duty to exercise universal jurisdiction.⁹ The only alternative to prosecution is extradition to another State.¹⁰ Although Article 8 is intended to remove, as far as possible, legal obstacles to extradition, the forum State can only avail itself of this alternative if another State makes an explicit extradition request and if extradition to this State is permissible under domestic and international law, and if it will actually lead to prosecution in the requesting State. Extradition to the territorial or national State would, for example, not be in accordance with the Convention in the case of a serious risk that the alleged offender would be subjected to torture, or, on the other hand, that the alleged offender would be shielded from prosecution.

9 Although all States parties to the Convention have an obligation to criminalize torture with appropriate penalties and to bring all perpetrators of torture to justice,¹¹ most States in which torture nevertheless occurs in practice have no strong interest in prosecuting their own officials. Here lies one of the main differences to most other crimes under international law, such as piracy or terrorist crimes. While pirates or terrorists are usually private individuals whose arrest, prosecution, or extradition is in the interests of Governments, torturers are usually public officials whose arrest, prosecution, or extradition is not in the interest of their 'own' countries, be they the territorial or the national State. Consequently, the principle of universal jurisdiction or jurisdiction based on the passive nationality principle seems to be even more important in relation to the crime of torture than to most other crimes under international law. To eliminate safe havens for torturers would, therefore, require that States parties actively pursue their obligations under the passive nationality and universal jurisdiction principles and that they are willing to bring the perpetrators to justice before their own courts rather than to rely on the alternative of extradition.

10 Prosecution under these two principles requires, however, that the forum State is in a position to gather all relevant evidence, including witness testimonies and documentary evidence. Without the active judicial assistance of the territorial and/or the national State, the forum State would often not be able to carry out effectively criminal investigations necessary for the prosecution of the alleged offender. Similarly, during the criminal trial the courts in the forum State might still need the judicial assistance of the territorial or national State.

3.2 Article 9(1): Provide Greatest Measure of Assistance

11 Article 9(1), which is based on Article 15 of the original Swedish draft,¹² establishes an obligation on States parties to afford one another the greatest measure of assistance in connection with criminal proceedings against alleged torturers. Although Article 9 speaks about mutual ('one another') assistance, this obligation primarily applies to the territorial and the national State of the alleged torturer. These two States shall supply all evidence at their disposal necessary for the criminal proceedings to other States parties exercising universal jurisdiction or jurisdiction on the basis of the passive nationality principle. Since the territorial or the national State are often not particularly interested in such prosecution, there is more than a theoretical risk that such States parties would also violate their respective obligations under Article 9(1). But the States exercising jurisdiction and requesting judicial assistance from other States parties can invoke the obligation of Article 9 in relevant legal proceedings if such assistance is not provided.

12 In this regard, the Committee against Torture expressed serious concern regarding the 'draconian system of secrecy' surrounding 'high value detainees' held by the United States in the context of the so-called 'war on terror'. The regime applied to these detainees not only prevented access to effective remedies and reparations, but also hindered investigation into human rights violations by other States due the United States's failure to provide the mutual assistance demanded by Article 9. The Committee therefore called upon the State party to 'take effective steps to ensure the provision of mutual assistance in all matters of criminal procedure regarding the offence of torture and the related crimes of attempting to commit, complicity and participation in torture'.¹³

13 Similarly, the Committee took also issue with Vatican's reported failure to provide civil authorities with information pertaining to the investigations into allegations of sexual abuse of minors by clergy members. The Committee urged the State party to take effective steps to ensure the provision of information to civil authorities in cases where they are carrying out criminal investigations of violations of the Convention perpetrated by Catholic clergy or acquiesced to by them. The State party should ensure the procedures for requesting such cooperation are clear and well-known and that requests for cooperation are responded to promptly.¹⁴

14 In its concluding observation to Sierra Leone's first State report, the Committee took note of the State party's Extradition Act; however, it voiced concern that there are no provisions in the act which provide for mutual judicial assistance regarding crimes as stipulated in Article 4.¹⁵

15 However, as held in the inadmissibility decision by the Committee in the case of Rosenmann v Spain, Article 9 does not impose any obligation for a State party to seek an extradition or to insist on its procurement in the event of a refusal. The applicant had invoked that Spain's handling of the extradition proceedings regarding General Augusto Pinochet from the United Kingdom failed to meet the requirement of Article 9(1) of the Convention. The Committee concluded, inter alia, that while the Convention imposed an obligation to bring to trial a person, who is found on its territory and alleged to have committed torture, no obligation to seek an extradition can be deduced from Article 9 (and 8). The complaint was decided to be inadmissible.¹⁶

16 In the case where two States parties are at the same time parties to a treaty on mutual judicial assistance, such as the EU Convention on Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters,¹⁷ Article 9(2) contains a savings clause to the effect that the legal assistance provided under Article 9(1) shall be carried out in conformity with such a treaty. It is also clear that the judicial assistance provided must be in conformity with the domestic laws of the State which provides such assistance. If certain evidence, such as information extracted by torture, is inadmissible before the courts in the requested State, it must also not be made available to the requesting State by means of judicial assistance.¹⁸

17 Panama responded for instance in 1993 that mutual legal cooperation existed between Panama and other States regardless of whether a formal bilateral agreement was in place.¹⁹ Canada indicated that it could cooperate with another country in accordance with Articles 8 and 9 regardless of whether bilateral treaties on mutual legal assistance existed. As an example of how the procedure of mutual legal assistance was applied in practice, information was provided on the assistance given by Canada at the request of Chile in 1993 in connection with a torture-related prosecution there.²⁰

18 While Article 9(2) states that States parties shall carry out their obligations under Article 9 'in conformity with any treaties on mutual judicial assistance that may exist between them', such treaties may nevertheless not run counter the Convention's purpose of bringing persons responsible for acts stipulated in Article 4 to justice. In this regard, the Committee criticized Benin for its conclusion of an agreement with the United States to the effect that US citizens present in Benin cannot be transferred to the International Criminal Court (ICC) when accused of war crimes or crimes against humanity. In its concluding observations to Benin's second State report, the Committee found such an agreement to be incompatible with Article 9 of the Convention.²¹

19 A 'best practice' case for the implementation of Article 9 is the cooperation between the United Kingdom, the United States, and Afghanistan leading to the conviction of former Afghan warlord Faryadi Sarwar Zardad on the basis of universal jurisdiction in the UK in 2005.²² Zardad had been a warlord in Afghanistan, running a checkpoint between Jalalabad and Kabul, at which travellers were frequently abducted and subjected to torture and ill-treatment. In 1998 he arrived in the United Kingdom to seek asylum. After his crimes came to light in the British media, Attorney General Lord Goldsmith announced that Britain had decided to try the case on the basis that his crimes were so 'merciless' and such 'an affront to justice' that they should be tried in any country.²³ Afghanistan and the United Kingdom, being parties to the Convention, were bound by the obligations that flow from it, including Article 9. Given that the United Kingdom had an obligation under the Convention either to 'extradite or prosecute', and given that no request for extradition had been received from the Afghan authorities, it fell to the United Kingdom to investigate and, if the test for prosecution was met, to prosecute Zardad.

20 Although Afghanistan had not requested his extradition, Afghan authorities actively supported the investigation teams of the British Crown Prosecution Service travelling altogether nine times to Afghanistan. In addition, the United States provided security support. Investigators within the Anti-Terrorist branch of the Metropolitan Police coordinated the investigation from London while sending delegates from the Branch to Afghanistan. The responsibility for prosecution lay with two prosecutors within the Counter-Terrorism Department of the Crown Prosecution Service. The prosecution went to Afghanistan together with the police on three occasions to ensure that statements taken from witnesses were sufficiently detailed. The prosecution also travelled with investigators to gain an understanding of the living circumstances of the witnesses and victims in Afghanistan, in order to assess the challenges witnesses might face in court. Due to logistical and security challenges in locating witnesses, television and radio broadcasts were used to encourage witnesses to come forward. In the United Kingdom, cooperation between the police, Crown Prosecution Service, and the Home Office was necessary to facilitate the bringing of witnesses to testify. The Foreign and Commonwealth Office referred the investigators' initial request for assistance to relevant authorities in the Afghan Government, which subsequently contacted the British embassy in Kabul. From that time, all further requests for assistance were dealt with by the British embassy directly. In addition, British authorities cooperated with US military and diplomatic personnel because of the need to conduct investigations in an area of Afghanistan under the effective control of US military forces. Prior to the investigation, the permission of the armed forces was obtained, and during the investigation in these areas protection was provided by US military personnel. While the prosecution against Zardad did not make use of Interpol, the police relied on Interpol contact points from the Netherlands and Denmark as both had experience of investigation of international crimes committed in Afghanistan. In total, the trial was estimated to have cost over £3 million.

1. Introduction

1 While Articles 4 to 9 deal with the obligation of States parties to criminalize torture and to bring perpetrators of torture to justice before domestic courts, Articles 10 to 13 contain the most important provisions for the prevention of torture and other forms of ill-treatment. Criminal law, of course, also has a preventive effect, but the obligations of States to ensure that the relevant personnel receive proper training, that interrogation methods and prison rules are regularly reviewed in relation to international minimum standards for the treatment of detainees and prison conditions, that prison directors, chiefs of police, and military commanders ex officio investigate any complaint or suspicion of torture by officials under their command, are at the core of torture prevention. If all the rules contained in these four Articles were carefully applied by States parties, torture would no longer exist and States would not even have to resort to conducting criminal trials against perpetrators of torture or to providing rehabilitation measures for victims of torture. Scholars, Amnesty International (AI),¹ and other NGOs have developed comprehensive programmes and highly effective action plans for the prevention of torture which have found their way into the respective provisions of the CAT and OP.

¹ AI, 'Amnesty International's 12-Point Programme for the Prevention of Torture and other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment by Agents of the State' AI Index ACT 40/001/2005 (2005) <<https://www.amnesty.org/download/Documents/80000/act400012005en.pdf>> accessed 8 December 2017.

The fact that torture continues to be widely or even systematically practised in many States in the world is not due to a lack of knowledge or material resources, but only to a lack of political will and commitment.

2 Measures aimed at the prevention of torture necessarily contribute to the prevention of other forms of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. By virtue of Article 16, all obligations contained in Articles 10 to 13, therefore, equally apply to torture and other forms of ill treatment. Since both conducts are absolutely prohibited under international law and are difficult to distinguish in practice, it simply would not make sense to establish such a distinction for purely preventive obligations, such as the training of personnel, review of interrogation and prison rules, or the investigation of suspected cases of excessive use of force by police or prison staff.

3 In many countries, personnel involved in the custody, interrogation, or treatment of any individual subjected to any form of arrest, detention, or imprisonment are poorly educated, receive low salaries, and are not well respected in society. At the same time, there is a high expectation that the police should solve criminal cases quickly, if possible by producing a confession from the suspected criminal. Similarly, prison directors are expected to maintain discipline among detainees, prevent escapes and prison riots, and ensure proper rehabilitation of prisoners without adequate training, salaries, and staff. In order to deal effectively and at the same time in a manner respectful of human rights with situations of highly complex organized crime, States have an obligation to organize their security, law enforcement, and prison apparatus in a professional manner. Rather than reducing or privatizing their security personnel, States must ensure that the number and quality of their staff must correspond to the actual needs of fulfilling the human right to personal security, as laid down in Article 9 CCPR. To ensure that human beings can live in a society without the constant fear of being a target of violent crime is one of the most noble and fundamental human rights obligations of Governments. A high level of internal security depends on many factors, including social coherence and stability. But a security for personnel is a conditio sine qua non for ensuring the human right to personal security. The professionalism of the security apparatus depends on its technical equipment, the number of staff, their visibility, acceptance by the population at large, and their education and training.

4 Human rights education is as important for personnel as training in using firearms and other technical equipment. The absolute prohibition of torture and other forms of ill-treatment is one of the most important components of a proper human rights education. A criminal investigation police officer interrogating a person suspected of having committed a criminal offence must understand that using torture for extracting a quick confession is not only unethical and a serious violation of human rights, but also unprofessional as well as inefficient and counterproductive.² A proper training should convey a twofold message: first, that, in the long run, the use of torture and ill-treatment does not make us safer, but less safe, because it undermines, with the quasi-approval of the State, the most fundamental principle of how human beings should behave towards each other, namely the principle of human dignity; second, that non-coercive investigation mechanisms, such as the investigative interviewing methods, are proven to be more efficient, because they provide more accurate and reliable information, are more likely to stand the

2. Each State party shall include this prohibition in the rules or instructions issued in regard to the duties and functions of any such persons.

2.2 Analysis of Working Group Discussions

9 In written comments on Article 5 of the original Swedish draft, the Spanish delegation proposed that the word ‘vocational’ be inserted in Article 5(1) before the word ‘training’. The United States submitted a separate proposal which corresponded with the Swedish draft and put more focus on the training of medical personnel. In the revised Swedish draft, the reference to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment was deleted because the delegations had agreed to deal with this in a separate provision.⁸ The final version also includes ‘other persons’, ie non-State personnel.

10 The United Kingdom was of the opinion that the word ‘include’ in Article 5(2) of the original Swedish draft be replaced by ‘give effect to’.⁹ However, the view was expressed that the existing wording was more effective.

11 Article 10 as redrafted was adopted by consensus by the Working Group in 1979.

3. Issues of Interpretation

3.1 Meaning of ‘personnel’ (Article 10(1))

12 The formulation of Article 10(2) and the travaux préparatoires clearly indicate that this State obligation applies to all persons who might come into contact with detainees. While Article 5 of the Declaration speaks of law enforcement personnel and ‘other public officials who may be responsible for persons deprived of their liberty’, Article 5 of the original Swedish draft added medical personnel. The revised Swedish draft further included the reference to ‘civil or military’ personnel as well as to persons involved in the interrogation of detainees. While all earlier drafts applied exclusively to public officials, the final wording of Article 10(1) goes beyond public officials in the narrow sense. It follows that States parties, such as the United States, which delegate the interrogation or custody of suspected criminals or terrorists to private security companies, shall ensure that such private security staff are also subject to proper training.¹⁰ The list of persons mentioned in the final wording of Article 10(1) is of an illustrative and non-exhaustive nature,¹¹ and the reference to ‘any form of arrest, detention or imprisonment’ shows that all persons responsible in whatever manner or function for persons deprived of liberty shall be covered. Further, since Article 10, by virtue of the reference in Article 16, also applies to other forms of ill-treatment outside detention, the obligation to provide education on how to avoid cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment, for example when arresting a person, dispersing a public gathering, or quelling a riot, extends to all law enforcement personnel whether responsible for detainees or not.

13 Article 10 primarily applies to all personnel authorized to use force, i.e. police, security, intelligence, and other law enforcement personnel, whether civil or military, public or private, uniformed or without uniforms. Secondly, it applies to all persons responsible for persons deprived of their liberty, i.e. any civil, military, police, intelligence, medical, and other staff working in prisons, pre-trial detention centres, police lock-ups, psychiatric hospitals, detention centres for minors, drug addicts, aliens pending deportation, asylum seekers, or refugees, etc. In the reporting procedure, the CAT Committee attaches particular importance to the training of doctors and other medical personnel working in detention or interrogation centres, for example forensic experts, paramedical, and nursing personnel.¹² One reason is that doctors may be actively involved in torture practices. But even more important is the positive role which doctors can and actually should play in detecting cases of torture by means of thorough medical examinations of every person entering or leaving any place of detention. Finally, doctors and psychiatrists play a crucial role in torture rehabilitation centres.¹³

14 More in general, the Committee has extended the scope of application of Article 10 to any other professionals involved in the documentation and investigation of allegations of torture and other forms of ill-treatment to ensure that every case of ill-treatment is detected and the perpetrators duly punished. Hence, in addition to medical personnel, this includes for example judges, prosecutors, and lawyers, so as to facilitate its direct invocation before and its application by domestic courts,¹⁴ but also other persons working with asylum seekers, refugees, and migrants,¹⁵ and all personnel involved in the implementation of torture victims rehabilitation programmes.¹⁶

3.2 Meaning of ‘training’, ‘education and information’ (Article 10(1))

15 The training of personnel shall convey the message that torture and other forms of ill-treatment are absolutely prohibited under all circumstances, even in times of armed conflicts, organized crime, and terrorism. Secondly, the personnel must understand that torture constitutes a serious crime which will be punished with appropriate penalties and that an order from a superior officer or a public authority may never be invoked as a justification of torture.¹⁷ Thirdly, personnel shall be reminded of their duty to report every case of torture and ill-treatment, whether committed by a person of equal, higher, or lower rank or function, to a judge or other independent official entrusted with the task of carrying out a proper investigation and bringing the perpetrator to justice. Finally, all respective personnel shall be provided with relevant information, education, and practical training on how to prevent torture and ill-treatment.

16 As already stressed by Burgers and Danelius, ‘this issue should not be treated with brevity or as a formality’.¹⁸ Twenty years after their well-known Handbook on the Convention against Torture had been published, experience unfortunately tells us that training, if included at all in the education curricula of relevant personnel, is still treated in many States parties as a mere formality or as a ‘soft issue’ requiring less attention than the ‘real police skills’, such as the use of firearms or self-defence techniques. Much more effort is, therefore, needed to convey the message that torture and ill-treatment have no place in a professional police force or prison system and that non-coercive measures are in the long run more efficient. Such training should include more extensive information about the international efforts to combat torture, as laid down for example in the revised Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners,¹⁹ the 1979 Code of Conduct for Law Enforcement Officials,²⁰ the 1982 Principles of Medical Ethics,²¹ the 1984 Safeguards Guaranteeing Protection of the Rights of those Facing the Death Penalty,²² the 1988 Body of Principles on Detention,²³ the 1990 Basic Principles on the Use of Force by Law Enforcement Officials,²⁴ the 1990 Basic Principles for the Treatment of Prisoners,²⁵ the 1990 Rules for the Protection of Juveniles deprived of their Liberty,²⁶ the 1992 Declaration on the Protection of all Persons from Enforced Disappearance,²⁷ and the 2000 Istanbul Protocol.²⁸

17 When it comes to the content of trainings, a recurring recommendation of the Committee is that States parties should systematically train all relevant staff to identify and document signs/cases of torture and ill-treatment, as well as to refer such cases to competent investigative authorities in accordance with the Istanbul Protocol.²⁹ The Committee also stressed the need to provide specialized trainings and raise awareness on gender-specific issues, such as sexual violence against women, harmful traditional practices, and on the rights of lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, and intersex persons, including their rights to autonomy and physical and psychological integrity,³⁰ and on the treatment of other vulnerable groups at risk of ill-treatment, such as children, migrants, Travellers, Roma, and others.³¹ The same goes for the need of specialized training on effective prevention, investigation, prosecutions, and punishment of acts of trafficking of human beings.³² More generally, the Committee has recommended States parties to additionally carry out public awareness campaigns, including through the media, on the prevention and prohibition of torture.³³

18 Such proactive training must be included in the regular education curricula of law enforcement, interrogation, prison, and medical staff as well as in regular in-service training curricula. Normally, this has the advantage to make trainings more practically relevant.³⁴ If torture and other forms of ill-treatment seem to be practised regularly in a country or a specific unit, the respective training needs to be reviewed and intensified.³⁵ In general, such training courses should not only be provided by governmental agencies and police training academies, but also by relevant NGOs.³⁶ Trainings should be conducted on a regular basis.

19 Alongside with information on the relevant human rights norms, trainings should also serve to professionalize the respective staff. A comprehensive empirical study on the effectiveness of torture prevention measures showed that trainings particularly designed to enhance professional skills and capabilities of personnel and intended to practically assist officials to do their job better is considerably more effective than trainings simply providing general information about human rights standards, which on the contrary may be perceived as ‘prescriptive and remote’ by the relevant personnel, especially police officers.³⁷ For example, the same study shows that trainings on investigative interviewing skills play a key role in the reduction of confession-driven investigations and thus reduce the risk of torture and other forms of ill-treatment.³⁸

20 In other words, it is important that trainings aiming at preventing torture and other forms of ill-treatment, as other human rights trainings, aim at the development of competencies at different levels, including knowledge (theory), skills, and attitudes (practice).³⁹

21 Finally, it is important that trainings are evaluated. In this regard, the Committee has consistently emphasized that States parties should develop and implement a specific methodology to regularly evaluate the effectiveness and impact of such training and programmes in the reduction of cases of torture, violence, and ill-treatment.⁴⁰

3.3 Meaning of ‘rules or instructions’ (Article 10(2))

21 In order to supplement and reinforce the obligation under paragraph 1, Article 10(2) requires States parties to include the prohibition of torture and other forms of ill-treatment in the rules or instructions issued in regard to the duties and functions of law enforcement, interrogation, prison, and medical staff. According to Burgers and Danelius, the authors of the Convention considered it essential that the prohibition of these practices should not be embodied only in general norms perhaps unfamiliar to many of the persons concerned, but that it should also form part of the specific rules and instructions given to those directly involved in the treatment of prisoners and detainees.⁴¹

22 Article 10(2) is based on Article 5 of the Declaration and Article 5 of the original Swedish draft which still included the word ‘general’ before ‘rules or instructions’. It follows that the prohibition of torture and ill-treatment shall be included not only in the respective training manuals, but also in both the general codes of conduct of public officials, civil or military, and in specific interrogation rules or instructions to prison guards, intelligence officers, criminal investigation police, and similar personnel in charge of persons deprived of their liberty, regardless of their rank. The incorporation of this explicit prohibition, in accordance with relevant international codes of conduct, was expected ‘to minimize the chances that individual police, prison or military personnel will commit such acts on their own initiative’ and at the same time ‘to make it highly difficult for the higher authorities to order, encourage or tolerate such practices’.⁴² By referring to the general and specific rules and instructions, Article 10(2) provides a link between the obligation of States parties under Article 10(1) to ensure proper training and their duty under Article 11 systematically to review their interrogation and prison rules. The travaux préparatoires of Article 11 show that the words ‘rules or instructions’ were also included in Article 11 in order to harmonize the formulation of both provisions. Article 10(2) will, therefore, also be taken into account for the interpretation of the substantive meaning of Article 11.⁴³

3.4 Can a Violation of Article 10 be Invoked in the Individual Complaint Procedure?

23 In addition, the question arises as to whether the failure of the State party to comply with Article 10 produces victims with the right to submit an individual complaint to hold the respective State party accountable. As explained in the commentary to Article 22, a victim is a person whose human rights have been violated by a State party. Consequently, the right to submit a complaint under Article 22 only refers to violations of CAT provisions that entail subjective rights of individuals.⁴⁴

24 While the Committee has already found violations of other procedural articles, such as Article 11, no such conclusion has ever been reached for individual complaints invoking Article 10. However, given the very similar nature of the obligations provided by Article 10 and Article 11, the fact that the Committee has already accepted that Article 11 can be invoked before it in the individual complaint procedure and amount to a violation suggests that a similar conclusion could in principle be reached also for complaints concerning Article 10.

25 This view seems to be supported by the decision in Keremedchiev v Bulgaria, where even if not finding a violation, the Committee has nevertheless accepted to pronounce itself on the merit of the Article 10 claim.⁴⁵ In the end, it held that it was not in a position to make any findings because the complainant had failed to provide any arguments or information to substantiate such claims, but one could argue that already the fact that the complaint was not dismissed as inadmissible ratione personae for lack of legal standing of the victim shows that the Committee had accepted that the complainant was in principle entitled to lodge an individual application before it complaining of an Article 10 violation. In this case, the objection of an incompatibility ratione personae was also not raised by the respondent State party, who simply argued that the claim had not been substantiated by the complainant.⁴⁶

26 Nevertheless, even if this conclusion is accepted, the exact scope of this State obligation will be difficult to define and several questions remain open. For example, it remains unclear whether the failure of a State party to include the prohibition of torture in the training of staff at a particular prison in clear violation of Article 10 could constitute a legitimate subject of complaint by every detainee of this prison or only by detainees who have been tortured; and whether the victim would have to prove that the lack of training was the decisive reason for his or her being subjected to torture.

1. Introduction

1 Although Article 11 only seems to establish the formal obligation to keep interrogation and detention rules under systematic review, this provision, which is closely linked to Articles 2(1), 10, and 16, constitutes one of the most important safeguards for the prevention of torture and other forms of ill-treatment. This was also recognized by the Human Rights Committee (HRC) which stated that ‘keeping under systematic review interrogation rules, instructions, methods and practices as well as arrangements for the custody and treatment of persons subjected to any form of arrest, detention imprisonment is an effective means of preventing cases of torture and other forms of ill-treatment’.¹

2 The CAT Committee interprets this provision as a guarantee for procedural and substantive minimum standards of interrogation and detention law and practices, as laid down in key human rights instruments. Article 11 is meant to further reinforce the general obligation of States parties under Article 2(1) and Article 16 to take effective measures to prevent torture and other forms of ill-treatment by a specific requirement to regularly review the conditions of detention, methods of interrogation and the treatment of detainees in general. In other words, Article 11 plays a key role in the practical implementation of the Convention obligations and by setting up a duty for States to review their rules and practices systematically aims at closing the gap between the law and practice.

3 In order to keep these standards under an effective and systematic review with a view to preventing any cases of torture and other forms of ill-treatment, States parties need to establish a system of regular and independent inspections of all places of detention, similar to those required for the NPM under the Optional Protocol which entered into force in June 2006.

2.2 Analysis of Working Group Discussions

7 During the 1979 Working Group the issue was raised as to whether the phrase 'territory under its jurisdiction' included occupied territories. It was agreed that the phrase had the same meaning as had earlier been agreed upon in connection with Article 2(1) of the revised draft.⁵

8 An opinion was also expressed that there were certain discrepancies between Articles 10 and 11 which would require in the future some additional drafting work. It was agreed that Article 11 should be amended to harmonize it with Article 10 by referring to 'interrogation rules, instructions, methods and practices'.⁶

3.1 Meaning of 'any case of torture'

9 The scope of application of Article 11 extends not only to torture but also to other forms of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.⁷ As established by Article 16(1) 'the obligations contained in articles 10, 11, 12 and 13 shall apply with the substitution for references to torture of references to other forms of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment'.⁸

3.2 Meaning of 'rules, instructions, methods and practices as well as arrangements'

10 The wording of Article 11, which refers to 'rules, instructions, methods and practices' as well as 'arrangements', clearly suggests that this provision shall apply not only to any legislative or administrative rules and instructions, but also to methods and practices. To this extent, it is worth remembering that Article 11, which initially referred only to 'interrogation methods and practices', was finally extended by the Working Group also to 'interrogation rules and instruction' with a view to harmonize it with Article 10.⁹ This means that States parties are not only required to review their written interrogation rules and instructions, but also their actual interrogation methods and practices. A similar conclusion can be reached in regard to the word 'arrangements' used with reference to custody and treatment of persons deprived of liberty.

3.3 Meaning of 'interrogations' and 'custody and treatment of persons deprived of liberty'

11 Article 11 covers rules and practices concerning interrogations but also the custody and treatment of persons deprived of liberty, ie those subjected to any form 'arrest, detention or imprisonment'. This concerns all contexts in which a person is deprived of his or her liberty, including detention facilities under the de facto control of a

State, as well as in ‘contexts where the failure of the State to intervene encourages and enhances the danger of privately inflicted harm’.¹⁰ The Committee has applied Article 11 broadly, including for example in relation to police custody,¹¹ premises of the intelligence and security departments,¹² pre-trial detention,¹³ administrative detention,¹⁴ juvenile justice,¹⁵ detention in psychiatric institutions,¹⁶ and in social institutions.¹⁷ This shows that the notion of ‘deprivation of liberty’ in Article 11 CAT can today be considered as corresponding to the definition of deprivation of liberty under Article 4 OP.¹⁸

3.4 Meaning of ‘any territory under its jurisdiction’

12 As for the territorial scope of application, it was agreed during the drafting of the Convention that the phrase ‘in any territory under its jurisdiction’ had the same meaning as had earlier been agreed upon in connection with Article 2(1) of the revised draft. The reader is therefore referred to Article 2 CAT in this Commentary.¹⁹

3.5 Meaning of ‘systematic review’

13 Under Articles 2(1) and 16(1), States parties shall take effective legislative, administrative, judicial, or other measures to prevent torture and other forms of ill-treatment. If the legislative or administrative rules and instructions for the conduct of interrogation and the treatment of detainees constitute an important way to prevent ill-treatment, the systematic review of such rules and practices is an essential step for the implementation and continual monitoring of these obligations.²⁰

14 Yet the interplay between Articles 1, 2, 16, and 11 makes it at times difficult to define the exact scope of application of Article 11. For example, in all decisions on individual complaints finding a violation of Article 11, the Committee has equally found a separate breach of Article 2 (alone²¹ or in conjunction with Article 1²²) or a violation of Article 11 together with Article 16.²³ On the contrary, the Committee has never found a violation of Article 11 without having first established a breach of Article 2 or Article 16.²⁴ Hence, although it has not stated this expressly, it seems that a violation of such provisions is a precondition for the finding of a violation of Article 11. A similar approach is taken in the reporting procedure.²⁵

15 Although closely interconnected, the States obligations under Article 11 are additional to those established under Articles 2 and 16 and are meant to further reinforce the prevention of torture and other forms of ill-treatment. In other words, the use of the term ‘systematic review’ in Article 11 indicates that the obligations under Article 11 go beyond the adoption of a set of rules and practices. States parties, in fact, will not discharge their Convention obligations by simply adopting written rules and instructions, and establishing methods, practices, and arrangements to implement them, but will also have to make sure that such rules and practices are kept under systematic review.²⁶ This means that States parties must ‘continually stay abreast of the actual situation’²⁷ and need to reform their rules and practices if they are not in line with the relevant standards.

3.5.1 Obligation to Oversee Any Form of Deprivation of Liberty

16 Concretely, one of the core element of this provision is that the State has the obligation to oversee any form of deprivation of liberty of the individual to prevent torture and other forms of ill-treatment. A combined reading of Articles 2, 16, and 11 has led the Committee to the conclusion that States parties are under an obligation to establish a system of regular and independent monitoring and inspections of all places of detention. The existence of this obligation is confirmed by the Committee’s jurisprudence. In fact, when considering complaints invoking Article 11 the Committee has also taken into consideration whether a monitoring mechanism is in place.²⁸ For example, in Kabura v Burundi and Niyonzima v Burundi the Committee has found a violation of Article 16, read in conjunction with Article 11 CAT, in view of the ‘manifest absence of any mechanism for monitoring’.²⁹ Similarly, in Colmenarez and Sanchoz v Venezuela, the Committee found a breach of Article 11 due to the absence of any measure aiming at reinforcing independent procedures of inspection in prison.³⁰ In doing so, the Committee has also, in certain instances, considered whether the absence of the monitoring mechanism had increased the risk for the person deprived of liberty of being subjected to acts of torture or other forms of ill-treatment;³¹ and the fact that the State party had not produced any information in this respect.³² Information provided by the State in this regard must be pertinent³³ and not of general nature.³⁴

18 In its concluding observations, the Committee has further clarified that such systematic review requires the establishment of an effective monitoring and inspection of all places of detention through ‘unrestricted’, ‘regular’, and ‘unannounced’³⁵ visits by independent national and international monitors in order to prevent torture and other forms ill-treatment.³⁶ Monitoring bodies should include non-governmental organizations.³⁷ Moreover, States parties should also follow up on the outcome of such monitoring process.³⁸

19 The obligation to establish a system of regular and independent monitoring is further strengthened by the entry into force of the OP, which requires States parties to establish an independent national preventive mechanism (NPM) to carry out unannounced visits to all places of detention.³⁹ Since then, the Committee has often encouraged States parties to consider the possibility of ratifying the OP and urged them to establish a NPM which ‘independently, effectively and regularly monitors and inspects all places of detention without prior notice, reports publicly on its findings, and raises with the authorities situations of detention conditions or conduct amounting to torture or other forms of ill-treatment’.⁴⁰

3.5.2 Standards of Review

20 The second core element of Article 11 is that, especially since the ‘systematic review’ needs to be done ‘with a view to preventing any cases of torture’, this provision establishes important procedural and substantive standards in relation to methods of interrogation, conditions of detention, and the treatment of persons deprived of liberty in general.

These minimum standards, deriving from the absolute prohibition of torture and, by virtue of Article 16, of other forms of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, as well as from the general obligation to prevent torture enshrined in Article 2, shall be reflected in the States' rules and practices concerning interrogations and detention.⁴¹

⁴⁸ CAT/C/GC/2 (n 10) para 13. Such guarantees include inter alia maintaining an official register of detainees, the right of detainees to be informed of their rights, the right promptly to receive independent legal assistance, independent medical assistance, and to contact relatives, the need to establish impartial mechanisms for inspecting and visiting places of detention and confinement, and the availability to detainees and persons at risk of torture and ill-treatment of judicial and other remedies that will allow them to have their complaints promptly and impartially examined, to defend their rights, and to challenge the legality of their detention or treatment; see also above Art 2, 3.1.2.

forms of ill-treatment are likely to occur during the first hours of deprivation of liberty or interrogation, all key fundamental legal safeguards are to be granted from the very outset of a person's deprivation of liberty. In fact, for the Committee 'it is precisely while they cannot communicate with their families and lawyers that suspects are most vulnerable to torture'.⁵⁰ Legal safeguards should then remain guaranteed throughout all stages of proceedings and all moments of deprivation of liberty.⁵¹

23 It is similarly worth noting that a precondition for the application of all safeguards that will be mentioned below is that all unofficial places of detention or interrogation are outlawed and no-one is detained in secret or unofficial facilities under the de facto control of the State party. According to the Committee, in fact, unofficial places of detention should be closed, as detaining individuals in such facilities is per se a breach of the Convention.⁵² As also put by the ECtHR 'unacknowledged detention of an individual is a "complete negation" of the guarantees against the deprivation of liberty and security of the person'.⁵³

25 The Committee has also called upon States parties to review their detention regime with a view to abolishing incommunicado detention,⁵⁴ referred to as 'a practice that is conducive to torture and enforced disappearances'.⁵⁵ Although it has never given a detailed definition of incommunicado detention,⁵⁶ the Committee seems to understand incommunicado detention as the practice of denying the persons deprived of liberty contacts with the outside world, including with his/her lawyer, doctors, family members, or other third persons. All persons held incommunicado should be released or charged and given a fair trial in accordance with due process.⁵⁷

26 With regard to specific safeguards, the Committee considered that persons deprived of their liberty should be fully informed of the charges against them and about their rights in a language they understand, and receive language assistance such as translation and interpretation.⁵⁸

27 Another key legal safeguard for persons deprived of liberty is the right to promptly contact a family member or any other person of their choice to notify them of the circumstances of their arrest and the place where they are being held, and their appearance before a judge.⁵⁹ In this regard, the Committee has recommended that any official that fails to allow notification of relatives promptly should be disciplined or sanctioned.⁶⁰

28 The Committee has similarly stressed the *right to remain silent*⁶¹ and the importance of prompt access to a qualified and independent lawyer.⁶² Despite not expressly defining what prompt access means,⁶³ the Committee has specified that access should be promptly given from the moment of deprivation of liberty and especially during the interrogation, investigation, and questioning process.⁶⁴ It condemned the practices of certain States to postpone access to a lawyer for up to six days⁶⁵ or a maximum of seventy-two hours in cases involving terrorism or organized crime,⁶⁶ arguing that this puts suspects held in custody at greater risk of torture. The Committee also noted that the right to be assisted by a lawyer must be funded at the State's expense, if necessary.⁶⁷ In this respect an independent free legal aid system for detainees should be established and rigorously adhered to.⁶⁸ Moreover, in line with the revised Mandela Rules now recognizing the right to legal representation 'in any legal matter',⁶⁹ the Committee recommended to guarantee access to legal representation and legal aid to all persons deprived of liberty, including during first instance administrative level of the asylum process.⁷⁰ It also highlighted that interpretation needs to be granted, when necessary.⁷¹ States must also ensure the full confidentiality of client–lawyer meetings as well as communications via telephone and correspondence.⁷² Appropriate premises should be made available where interviews between the accused and their counsel can take place within sight (but not within earshot) of a police officer or official of the establishment concerned.⁷³

29 Equally important is the right to have immediate access to a qualified and independent medical doctor.⁷⁴ In its concluding observations to Liechtenstein, the Committee indicated that all persons arriving in a penitentiary institution should be examined by an independent medical doctor within 24 hours of arrival.^{75,76} Patient–doctor confidentiality during such medical examinations should be granted, and police officers should not be present during medical examinations of persons in police custody. This is in order to guarantee the confidentiality of medical information, save under exceptional and justifiable circumstances (ie, risk of physical aggression).⁷⁷ Access to a doctor must not only be guaranteed immediately following arrest,⁷⁸ but additionally at regular intervals thereafter and in particular before release.⁷⁹

30 Further the Committee noted that any person deprived of liberty should be brought before a judge as soon as possible following the arrest and not later than forty-eight hours.⁸⁰ Concerns were shown about certain national legislation allowing that this period be delayed in relation to persons accused of security-related offences or under a state of emergency.⁸¹ This long time frame is excessive and may leave room for acts of torture by the security forces.

31 In line with what is provided by other international instruments,⁸² all persons deprived of liberty have the right to have their detention recorded in a register.⁸³ States parties have to take appropriate measures to establish a standardized, computerized, and centralized officials registers in which arrests are ‘immediately and scrupulously recorded’.⁸⁴ Registers must be kept at all stages of deprivation of liberty.⁸⁵ In particular, officials register should include the exact date, time, and place of detention of all persons deprived of their liberty. Most importantly ‘the time of de facto apprehension is accurately recorded to ensure that the first unrecorded hours of unacknowledged detention between the arrest and delivery to a police station cannot be used by law enforcement officials to obtain confessions by means of torture’.⁸⁶ In other words, registration is to be done promptly after the moment of apprehension and not only upon formal arrest or charging.⁸⁷ The prisoner’s file management should be kept regularly up to date.⁸⁸ As a minimum, registers should contain ‘information on the identity of the detainee, date, time and place of the detention, the identity of the authority that detained the person, grounds for the detention, date and time of admission to the detention facility, state of health of the detainee upon admission and any changes thereto, time and place of interrogations, with names of all interrogators present, as well as the date and time of release or transfer to another detention facility’.⁸⁹ Registers should document the use of restraints, including the reasons for use, duration of use, and particular method of restraint used,⁹⁰ and contain information on interrogations.⁹¹ Registers should be accessible by lawyers and relatives of those detained.⁹² As detailed below, recording of interrogations should take the form of audio-videotaping of interrogations. The Committee has further recommended States to ‘carry out monitoring and inspections on a systematic basis in order to ensure fulfilment of the obligation to duly record the information regarding each arrest that is outlined in the Body of Principles’.⁹³ All obligations concerning the prisoners file management needs to respect the principle of non-discrimination.⁹⁴

32 The Committee has also set specific standards of review with regard to the custody and treatment of persons subjected to any form of arrest, detention or imprisonment, eg relating to the conditions of detention and, in particular, disciplinary sanctions and other restrictions. With this regard, both the HRC and the CAT Committee referred to the Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners as the most important non-binding standard relevant for the interpretation of Article 10 CCPR and Article 11 CAT.⁹⁵ The revision of the Mandela Rules, concluded in December 2015, further consolidated them as a key reference point.⁹⁶ During such revision, the Committee submitted general observations on the Rules,⁹⁷ thereby clarifying its position on some crucial aspects concerning Article 11 and complementing its previous jurisprudence and practice.

33 Lack of ventilation, poor sanitary conditions, repeated measures of prolonged isolation, holding suspects incommunicado, frequent transfers from one prison to another, the mixing of women and men, juveniles and adults, convicted prisoners and pre-trial detainees could lead to inhuman or degrading treatment in violation of Article 10 CCPR and/or Articles 16 and 11 CAT.⁹⁸ If the issue of detention conditions is examined in details under Article 16 in this Commentary, for the purpose of this Article it is particularly interesting to illustrate it in its relation with Article 11. As mentioned above, the Committee has in certain instances found a violation of Article 16 in conjunction with Article 11.⁹⁹ In these decisions, a reference was made to overcrowding and size of cells; access to light, food, or water; access to a medical doctor; and more generally to ‘insanitary conditions’. More generally, in all cases the Committee found the State to be responsible under Article 11 due to the absence of a monitoring mechanism.

34 In the reporting procedure, in order to reduce the prison population and avoid overcrowding, the Committee stressed the need to increase the use of non-custodial measures in conformity with the Tokyo Rules,¹⁰⁰ and urged States to reduce the use and the length of pre-trial detention. To this extent, it has recommended to accelerate proceedings and ensure that pre-trial detention is regulated clearly and is subject to judicial supervision, as well as that redress and compensation are provided to victims of unjustified prolonged pre-trial detention.¹⁰¹

35 The Committee has also addressed other issues, eg the separation of different groups of detainees. Unlike other international instruments, the Convention does not expressly provide for it.¹⁰² Yet, departing from the obligation to review policies and procedures for the custody and treatment of detainees, it has consistently recommended States to ensure a strict separation of men and women, remand and convicted prisoners,¹⁰³ as well as—in all circumstances—persons under eighteen years of age and adults.¹⁰⁴ In addition, with a view to prevent sexual violence in detention detainees should be guarded by officers of the same gender.¹⁰⁵ Separating the different categories of prisoners makes it easier for the State authorities to meet the detainees' needs, protect their human dignity, and more generally prevent torture and other forms of ill-treatment, sexual violence, or harassment.¹⁰⁶

36 Restrictions or disciplinary sanctions should never amount to torture or other forms of ill treatment.¹⁰⁷ They are nevertheless permitted under certain limited conditions, ie if imposed in line with the principles of legality, proportionality, and necessity.

37 With regard to body searches,¹⁰⁸ the Committee has recommended that searches to both visitors and detained persons should be duly regulated¹⁰⁹ and conducted only when strictly necessary and proportionate to the intended objective by trained personnel. Searches should be conducted in private, and in a way that is the least intrusive and most respectful of the individual dignity and integrity. Whenever possible, States should use alternatives, such as electronic detection scanning methods. Similarly, the Committee recommended States Parties to ensure strict supervision, and training of the personnel conducting the searches. In practice, a key factor taken into account by the Committee when considering searches seems to be the frequency. Often concerns was expressed by the Committee for the 'frequent', 'systematic', 'widespread', 'routine' use of body searches.¹¹⁰ Similarly, in relation to France, the Committee showed concerns for the 'intrusive and humiliating nature' of body searches, especially internal, and regretted that the procedures regulating the frequency and methods of searches in prisons and detention centres were determined by the prison authorities themselves.¹¹¹

38 The Committee has consistently urged States Parties to review interrogation and detention rules to ensure that *solitary confinement*¹¹² is applied only in exceptional circumstances as a last resort measure and for the shortest time possible.¹¹³ Indefinite solitary confinement is considered prohibited, as it is the practice of renewing the measure with the imposition of subsequent periods of solitary confinement.¹¹⁴ In this regard, it is useful to also refer to the revised Mandela Rules, which define it as the 'confinement of a prisoner for 22 hours or more a day without meaningful human contact', and prolonged solitary confinement for 'period in excess of 15 consecutive days'.¹¹⁵ The Committee further expressed concerns for Prison Rules imposing solitary confinement on 'vague grounds',¹¹⁶ and recommended to establish 'clear and specific criteria' for decisions on isolation.¹¹⁷ In contrast, it recommended States to consider the findings of the SRT Mendez who urged States to prohibit the imposition of solitary confinement as a form of punishment, either as a part of a judicially imposed sentence or a disciplinary measure.¹¹⁸ Offences committed by a detainee requiring more severe sanctions should, in fact, be addressed within the criminal law system.¹¹⁹ In line with other international standards,¹²⁰ in the Committee's view, solitary confinement should not be applied for certain categories of detainees, including for example asylum seekers,¹²¹ persons with intellectual or psychosocial disabilities, pregnant women, women with infants and breastfeeding mothers,¹²² and juveniles.¹²³ Solitary confinement should be equally prohibited for life-sentenced prisoners or prisoners sentenced to death, and for pre-trial detainees.¹²⁴ In any event, if imposed, States Parties should ensure strict supervision and judicial review.¹²⁵ This, for example, includes that the detainee's physical and mental condition is regularly monitored by qualified medical personnel throughout the period of solitary confinement, and that such medical records are made accessible to the detainees and their legal counsel.¹²⁶ The Committee has equally urged States to increase the level of psychologically meaningful social contact for detainees while in solitary confinement.¹²⁷ As to the layout of places of detention, the Committee in November 1993 called on Turkish authorities to demolish immediately and systematically all the solitary confinement cells known as 'coffins' which in themselves were found to constitute a form of torture. These cells measure approximately sixty to eighty centimetres, have no light and inadequate ventilation, and the inmate can only stand or crouch.¹²⁸

39 In its observations on the revision of the Mandela Rules, the Committee has similarly stated to reject other disciplinary punishments, including severe punishment on prisoners serving life sentences, such as routine handcuffing when outside cells, and segregation.¹²⁹

40 Restraints measures, too, should be strictly regulated and applied only in exceptional circumstances, as a last resort, and for the shortest possible time.¹³⁰ This means that no systematic or excessively frequent use of restraints is permitted.¹³¹ To be lawful, they must respect the principles of legality, necessity, and proportionality. They should be regulated in line with international standards,¹³² and be used only when less intrusive alternative measures have failed.¹³³ In practice, the Committee has often expressed its concerns for the use of certain instruments of restraints in prison settings. It has, for example, recommended abolishing the routine handcuffing of prisoners serving life sentencing;¹³⁴ and the minimization of the use of physical restraints with a view to abandoning it.¹³⁵ Recommendations were also made regarding the use of restraints in the context of arrest,¹³⁶ interrogation,¹³⁷ pre-trial detention,¹³⁸ forced returns,¹³⁹ and in the context of psychiatric facilities.¹⁴⁰ In this last regard, the Committee expressed concerns on the 'use of restraint and forced administration of intrusive and irreversible treatments such as neuroleptic drugs'.¹⁴¹

41 The Committee has also put forward recommendations on the use of force. In contexts concerning deprivation of liberty, the Committee noted that use of force should be in line with the UN Basic Principles on the Use of Force and Firearms by Law Enforcement Officials. States should further ensure that law enforcement officers receive training on the absolute prohibition of torture and more specifically on the Basic Principles.¹⁴² More specific recommendations were given by the Committee on the use of electrical discharge weapon. In this regard, it was clarified that their use should be limited to extreme situations, where there is an immediate threat to life or risk of serious injury, as a substitute of lethal weapons (eg firearms).¹⁴³ Electrical discharge weapons should not be included in the regular equipment of custodial staff in prisons or any other place of deprivation of liberty,¹⁴⁴ and stringent and detailed instructions should be provided to law enforcement personnel authorized to use electric discharge weapons.¹⁴⁵ Hence, according to the Committee their use is to be permitted only in strict compliance with principles of legality, necessity, and proportionality. The Committee has further clarified the need of close monitoring and supervision through recording, mandatory reporting, and review of each use.¹⁴⁶ Moreover, all complaints of violations with regard to restraints should be promptly, effectively, and independently investigated and the persons responsible held to account (see also Article 12, below).¹⁴⁷

42 The Committee seems to distinguish electrically discharged weapons from direct contact body-worn electric shock devices. For example, in its 2000 observation to the United States the Committee urged the State to the abolition of ‘electro-shock stun belts and restraint chairs as methods of restraining those in custody’,¹⁴⁸ as ‘their use almost invariably leads to breaches of article 16 of the Convention’.¹⁴⁹ In its subsequent concluding observations to Macao, however, pronouncing itself on the use of contact body-worn electric shock devices during transfers, the Committee expressed the view that ‘body-worn electric shock devices should be subject to the principle of necessity and proportionality ...’.¹⁵⁰

43 Invoking Article 11, the Committee also made recommendations on personnel, including medical staff.¹⁵¹ Besides reinforcing training programmes specifically concerning the prevention of torture and other forms of ill-treatment, for the analyses of which the reader is remanded to Article 10 above, the Committee has recommended to increase the number of qualified personnel also in order to prevent incidents, such as death in custody and suicides, as well as inter-prisoner violence.¹⁵² Moreover, it further recommended that all penitentiary personnel, as well as special forces, be equipped with visible identification badges at all times to ensure the protection of inmates from acts in violation of the Convention.¹⁵³

3.5.2.2 Standards of Review relating to Interrogations

44 As noticed in the previous paragraphs, the fundamental legal safeguards mentioned above are to be granted from the very outset of custody, and thus also in the context of interrogations. When referring to interrogations, the Committee further specified that recording of interrogations should take the form of audio-videotaping of interrogations. This form of recording was defined by the Committee as a ‘new’ and ‘effective’ method of prevention of torture and other forms of ill-treatment.¹⁵⁴ In the reporting procedure, the Committee has consistently recommended States Parties make audio-video recording a mandatory, standard, and systematic procedure,¹⁵⁵ and provide the necessary resources to that end.¹⁵⁶ Audio-video recording should be conducted in all places where torture and other forms of ill-treatment are likely to occur, including detention facilities, police stations, and cells, except in cases where it might violate the right to privacy or a detainee’s right to confidential consultation with their lawyer or doctor.¹⁵⁷ It must apply to all persons questioned, regardless of the type of crime they are accused of.¹⁵⁸ In this last regard, the Committee specified that the recording should apply also to persons accused of security-related offences.¹⁵⁹ The interrogation must be recorded in its entirety, and the police should be held accountable for withholding, deleting, or manipulating records of interrogations.¹⁶⁰ The audio view system should be independent and effective with no institutional or hierarchical links with investigators.¹⁶¹ Audio-visual footage should be kept in secure facilities for a period sufficient for it to be used as evidence, and made available¹⁶² to all competent judicial authorities,¹⁶³ to detainees, their lawyers and family members,¹⁶⁴ and others as appropriate.¹⁶⁵ In order to guarantee the protection of detainees during interrogation, the Committee also recommended the general separation between the authorities responsible for detention, on the one hand, and investigation on the other.¹⁶⁶

46 In its concluding observations, the Committee has further specified that interrogation methods contrary to the provisions of the Convention are to be prohibited and never used by States parties under any circumstances.¹⁶⁷ While condemning the use of ‘confusing interrogation rules’ and techniques defined in vague and general terms,¹⁶⁸ the Committee urged States parties to rescind all interrogation techniques that constitute torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment in all places of detention under its de

47 Finally, the Committee has urged States to ‘improve methods of criminal investigation to end practices whereby confessions are relied on as the primary and central element of proof in criminal prosecution, in some cases in the absence of any other evidence’.¹⁸⁰ As put by the SRT Mendez, ‘the principal safeguard against mistreatment during questioning is the interviewing methodology itself’.¹⁸¹ The position of the Committee on this point mirrors the current debate on interviewing methods in the literature and other UN and regional mechanism,¹⁸² suggesting that—together with the due process and procedural safeguards mentioned above—the existence of a non-accusatorial and non-confession driven systems of investigation is a key element for the prevention of torture and other forms of ill-treatment during interrogations. Similar recommendations were put forward by the SRT Mendez, who after extensive consultations with experts, published a report encouraging States to adopt an investigative interviewing model on the example of the PEACE model of England and Wales and the ICC.¹⁸³ To this extent, Mendez also called for the development of a universal protocol for investigative interviews model designed on ‘non-coercive, ethically sound, evidence based, research-based and empirically founded’ interviews and based on the principle of presumption of innocence. Such type of questioning should aim to gather ‘accurate and reliable information in order to discover the truth’ through, for example, systematic preparation, empathetic rapport-building, open-ended questions, active listening, strategic probing, and disclosure of potential evidence.¹⁸⁴ Adequate and regular training for law enforcement and other personnel involved in the questioning of persons in modern criminal investigation techniques and equipment is critical in the implementation of such methodology and, ultimately, in the eradication of the perception that torture, other forms of ill-treatment and coercion are the best ways to obtain confessions or other information.¹⁸⁵ The protocol also aims at promoting minimum standards and procedural safeguards designed to prevent improper interviewing practices in different investigative contexts.¹⁸⁶

GIULIANA MONINA

¹⁸³ The PEACE model of interviewing was adopted in 1992 in England and Wales. It comprises five steps including: preparation and planning; engage and explain; account; closure; and evaluation. Initially developed for criminal investigations, models of investigative interviewing can provide positive guidance for the protocol and be applied in a wide range of investigative contexts, including during intelligence and military operations. Such a model was then adopted by other jurisdiction, for example the ICC. For more information see SRT (Mendez) A/71/298 (n 49) para 47; CTI, Training Tools 1/2017 (n 182).

1. Introduction

1 Widespread impunity is one of the root causes for the continuation of torture and ill-treatment.¹ Although many States have aligned their legal framework to international standards by enacting new anti-torture laws, these have often not been used in practice. The implementation gap between law and practice has reportedly even increased over the last decades.² The exception is where the law requires the investigation by fully independent bodies—of which there are however only very few examples worldwide.³ Thus, impunity remains a widespread problem.

2 In the 2010 Global Study on the Phenomenon of Torture and other forms of Ill-treatment, the then UNSRT Manfred Nowak has described the magnitude of impunity in most countries visited as ‘close to total’ and as ‘one of the most disappointing findings’ of his tenure.⁴ He identified a ‘don’t ask, don’t tell’ approach among law enforcement officials regarding suspects who show signs of torture thereby ignoring the obligation to initiate ex officio obligations.⁵ Allegations of torture are all too often not taken seriously in a general mistrust of (suspected) criminals.⁶ Where investigations are carried out, this is often not done in an effective manner. The key problem appears to be that most investigations are carried out by the same authorities who are accused of committing such acts or that have close links to the suspects, usually the police. The strong feelings of loyalty and solidarity among police officers pose a serious conflict of interest for the investigators.⁷ The lack of impartiality often extends to prosecutors and judges, who are more likely to side with law enforcement officials than alleged ‘criminals’ or ‘terrorists’, resulting in a considerable reluctance to bring charges.⁸

3 Combating impunity is one of the most important objectives of the CAT.⁹ It obliges states to criminalize torture (Article 4), to establish (universal) jurisdiction over the crime (Articles 5 to 9), and thereby to ensure that there is no ‘safe haven’ for torturers. Moreover, victims of torture need to have the effective possibility to complain about torture without having to fear reprisals and have their case promptly and impartially investigated by competent authorities (Article 13).

4 Article 12 reinforces the investigative duty by shifting the responsibility of initiating an investigation to the State. It does not depend on a complaint but the competent authorities need to proceed ‘wherever there is reasonable ground to believe that an act of torture has been committed in any territory under its jurisdiction’. This obligation to institute investigations ex officio is very important as victims of torture and other forms of ill-treatment often have no access to complaints mechanisms or fail to complain due to fear of reprisals and a lack of trust in the mechanisms. Therefore, during the discussions of both provisions, the Working Group in 1980 reversed the order contained in the Declaration and the original Swedish draft to start with the obligation now contained in article 12 on the ground that ‘the prevention and punishment of acts of torture were primarily the responsibility of the Government of States parties and not that of the victim, who may not be in a position to make complaints’.¹⁰

5 Although the reasoning for the reversal of Articles 12 and 13 in the Working Group refers to ‘prevention and punishment’, one needs to distinguish the investigation required by these two provisions from the criminal investigation and prosecution foreseen in Articles 6(2) and 7. Articles 5 to 9 require States parties to establish different types of jurisdiction with the aim of avoiding safe havens for individuals responsible for torture practices and, as soon as such individuals are present on their territory, to arrest them for the purpose of either prosecution or extradition. The obligation to bring individual perpetrators to justice only applies to torture, not to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment.¹¹

6 Articles 12 and 13, on the other hand, are not part of the criminal jurisdiction provisions in the Convention, but of those establishing effective measures for the prevention of torture as well as other forms of ill-treatment.¹² The obligation to investigate is not triggered by the fact that a suspected torturer is on the territory of a State party, but by the suspicion of the competent authorities of a State party that an act of torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment might have been committed in any territory under its jurisdiction.¹³ The duty to investigate is explicitly applicable to torture and other forms of ill-treatment (Article 16 (1)). However, in its practice, the Committee does not always make a clear distinction between Articles 12 and 13 as well as between these two preventive provisions and the requirement of criminal investigations under Articles 5 to 9.¹⁴

7 The effective investigation of torture and other forms of ill-treatment has numerous purposes as spelt out in the Principles on the Effective Investigation and Documentation of Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (Istanbul Principles) that have been endorsed by the Committee against Torture and other human rights bodies:¹⁵ clarification of the facts and establishment and acknowledgement of individual and State responsibility for victims and their families; identification of measures needed to prevent recurrence; facilitation of prosecution, and/or, as appropriate, disciplinary sanctions for those indicated by the investigation as being responsible, and demonstration of the need for full reparation and redress from the State, including fair and adequate financial compensation and provision of the means for medical care and rehabilitation.¹⁶

Each State Party shall ensure that, even if there has been no formal complaint, its competent authorities proceed to a prompt and impartial investigation, wherever there is reasonable ground to believe that an act of torture has been committed in any territory under its jurisdiction.

2.2 Analysis of Working Group Discussions

12 In written comments on Article 10 of the original Swedish draft, France suggested that the words ‘reasonable ground’ (de bonnes raisons) be replaced by ‘serious grounds’ (des raisons sérieuses).²²

13 The United States explicitly voiced the opinion that it would be appropriate that the obligation to conduct a speedy, impartial, and effective investigation apply both to acts of torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment if there is reasonable basis for belief that an offence has been committed.²³

14 The United Kingdom proposed that the word ‘jurisdiction’ be deleted from the last line of Article 10 and replaced with ‘territory’.²⁴

15 During the discussion in the 1980 Working Group it was suggested that Articles 12 and 13 be reversed. The rationale of the representative who made this proposal was that the prevention and punishment of acts of torture were primarily the responsibility of the Governments of States parties and not that of the victim, who may not be in a position to make complaints. The Working Group agreed to this proposal. It further decided to delete the phrase ‘even if there has been no formal complaint’ contained in Article 13.²⁵

16 In response to the question on the scope of the phrase ‘territory under its jurisdiction’, it was said that it was intended to cover, inter alia, territories still under colonial rule and occupied territories.

3. Issues of Interpretation

17 The duty to conduct prompt and impartial investigations is of crucial importance in the fight against torture and other forms of ill-treatment. Therefore Committee has recommended ‘the setting up of a specific legal framework, to eliminate impunity for perpetrators of acts of torture and ill-treatment by ensuring that all allegations are investigated promptly, effectively and impartially’,²⁶ notably the inclusion of the obligation in legislation such as the criminal procedure code.²⁷ The UNSRT has equally recommended enshrining the fundamental principles of investigation in legislation²⁸ and that there ‘should be protocols and guidelines for the prison administration about cooperating with the authorities by not obstructing the investigation and by collecting and preserving evidence’. The CPT emphasized that ‘the legal framework for accountability will be strengthened if public officials (police officers, prison directors, etc) are formally required to notify the relevant authorities immediately whenever they become aware of any information indicative of ill-treatment.’²⁹

18 At the same time the Committee has criticized the frequently substantial gap between the legal framework and its practical implementation with many countries without any or no meaningful record of investigations, prosecution, and sentencing of torture despite widespread reports and numerous complaints of torture.³⁰ Therefore a legal framework is clearly not enough: the relevant authorities also need to be sensitized about the obligations incumbent upon them³¹ and practical measures need to be taken to ensure effective investigations—most importantly by creating an independent investigation mechanism.³² A continuous point of criticism is the lack of data provided by States on the number of complaints, investigations, prosecutions, and sentences for torture. This makes it very difficult for the CAT Committee to assess whether the State party is effectively implementing the duty to investigate.

3.1 Meaning of ‘reasonable ground to believe’

19 A head of a police station or a pre-trial detention centre does not have to wait until a detainee comes to his or her office and lodges a formal complaint of torture. Article 9 of the Declaration and the different drafts of Article 12 CAT required States to proceed promptly to an impartial investigation ‘even if there has been no formal complaint’. This phrase was only omitted after the order of Articles 12 and 13 had been reversed with the aim of underlining that investigations should normally start ex officio and not on the basis of a formal complaint.³³

3.1.1 Obligation to Proceed to an Investigation Ex Officio

20 The obligation to proceed to an investigation *ex officio*³⁴ in Article 12 shifts the responsibility to initiate an investigation from the victim to the State authorities most directly involved. It does not need a complaint and evidently even less so proof by the alleged victim that he or she has been subjected to torture. This is of vital importance since torture and other forms of ill-treatment usually take place behind closed doors without any outside witnesses, and the survivors are often too afraid to complain officially about such practices. The obligation extends to other forms of ill-treatment as explicitly stated in Article 16, para 1. Consequently, legally requiring a formal request as a precondition for opening an inquiry and the initiation of judicial investigation proceedings constitutes a violation of Article 12 CAT.³⁵

³⁴ Blanco Abad v Spain, No 59/1996, UN Doc CAT/C/20/D/59/1996, 14 May 1998, para 8.2. In Thabti v Tunisia, No 187/2001, UN Doc CAT/C/31/D/187/2001, 14 November 2003, the Committee confirmed its earlier jurisprudence and noted that Article 12 places an obligation on the authorities to ‘proceed automatically’ to a prompt and impartial investigation whenever there are reasonable grounds to believe that an act of torture or ill-treatment has been committed, ‘no special importance being attached to the grounds for suspicion’.

21 The Committee repeatedly stressed that once there is a reasonable ground to believe that torture or ill-treatment have been committed the decision on whether to conduct an investigation is not discretionary.³⁶ It found a system that leaves the option of not ordering an investigation or not prosecuting the perpetrators of acts of torture and other forms of ill-treatment involving law enforcement officers to be in contravention of Article 12.³⁷ It also rejected the requirement of prior ministerial authorization for investigating law enforcement officials.³⁸ The Council of Europe Guidelines on Effective Investigation of Ill-treatment additionally prescribe that the decision to discontinue or not an investigation should only be taken by ‘an independent, competent authority upon thorough and prompt consideration of all the relevant facts’ and ‘should be subject to appropriate scrutiny and challengeable by means of a public and adversarial judicial review process’ in order to ensure the mandatory nature of investigations.³⁹ The Committee has also continuously criticized amnesty laws and stressed that waivers of prosecution and statutes of limitations do not apply under any circumstance to the crime of torture.⁴⁰

3.1.2 Origin and Level of Suspicion Required

22 The origin of the suspicion to be considered is interpreted broadly by the CAT Committee. In the leading case Blanco Abad v Spain the Committee found that the authorities have a duty to investigate ‘wherever there are reasonable grounds to believe that acts of torture or ill-treatment have been committed and whatever the origin of the suspicion’.⁴¹ This is confirmed in the Istanbul Principles, passed by the General Assembly in 2000, stating that the investigative duty is triggered ‘if there are other indications that torture or ill-treatment might have occurred’⁴² as well as in ECHR case law, CPT reports, and the CoE Guidelines.⁴³

23 Most evidently a suspicion arises where a person shows signs of abuse. If a person arrives healthy at a police station and leaves the same police station a short time later with certain bruises or injuries, this is a ‘reasonable ground’ to believe that an act of torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment has been committed.⁴⁴ This also goes for injuries that have occurred otherwise in the control of the state, eg during arrest. This has been confirmed in the case FK v Denmark where the complainant had cut himself resisting arrest and maintained that the treatment of the authorities amounted to ill-treatment. The Committee considered that in light of the fact that the circumstances of the incident and the intensity of the force used were disputed, the police could not accept ‘face value the explanation that the complainant had hurt himself’ and remained under the duty to initiate a prompt investigation.⁴⁵ Consequently, whether the injuries were self-inflicted, the result of a legitimate use of force by the respective police officers or the result of ill-treatment needs to be established by a prompt and impartial investigation before an independent body.

24 It is however not necessary that the survivor displays signs of abuse. In the case Blanco Abad v Spain the Committee found a violation of Article 12 on the ground that the High Court had not started an investigation despite having before it five reports of a forensic physician which noted that the applicant had ‘complained of having been subjected to ill-treatment consisting of insults, threats and blows, of having been kept hooded for many hours and of having been forced to remain naked, although she displayed no signs of violence.’ The Committee considered that these elements should have sufficed for the instigation of an investigation.⁴⁶ The UNSRT has repeated that demanding evidence of torture rising to the level of ‘proof’ (ie beyond a reasonable doubt) should not be necessary to establish the duty to investigate. Demanding visible or recognizable marks is problematic in countries where independent medical examinations are lacking and gives authorities the possibility to escape accountability by delaying an examination.⁴⁷ Moreover, torture and ill-treatment often leave no visible marks.⁴⁸ At the same time the Committee found in the case AA v Denmark that a general allegation that the detention as such—due to the vulnerability of the detainee as former victim of torture—amounts to a violation of the Convention is not sufficient as in that case ‘no reasonable purpose would have been served by such investigation.’⁴⁹

25 The sources of information providing a ‘reasonable ground’ can be manifold. Efficient procedural safeguards are not only among the most effective means of preventing torture⁵⁰ but the prompt notification of family members, access to a lawyer and an independent medical examination also provide for important means to detect torture and other forms of ill-treatment of a detainee and bring it to the attention of the competent investigation mechanism. Moreover, the examination before a judge within forty-eight hours after arrest, usually the first opportunity for victims to complain about their treatment, is an important opportunity to detect ill-treatment of detainees. The Committee has held that judges should inquire explicitly about the treatment received and should ask questions to check that all statements to the prosecutor were made freely and without any form of coercion. In case of an allegation the judge should record the allegation in writing, immediately order a forensic medical examination, and take all necessary steps to ensure the allegation is fully investigated.⁵¹

26 Of particular importance for the detection of possible ill-treatment is a thorough and independent medical examination of every detainee when arriving at a particular detention facility, when leaving this facility, and at any other time, in particular at his or her own request. Any physician examining a person detained or being released should question him or her specifically about torture and other forms of ill-treatment, take the answer into account in conducting the medical examination, and include both the question and answer in the medical report.⁵² It is of crucial importance that the examination is impartial which is why the Committee considers that the procedure for the medical examination of persons in police custody should be completely separate from the police element and the doctor independent of the police authorities.⁵³ By means of a medical examination any sign of ill-treatment can be immediately detected and documented, making it possible to determine from which period it emanates, eg arrest, police detention, prison, etc. Moreover, it is often difficult and painful for a torture victim to talk about the traumatic experience and it is necessary to create conditions where the victim feels safe from reprisals and trustful that his or her allegations are taken seriously. An independent and competent doctor may be the best person to inquire about possible ill-treatment and gain the trust of the detainee.⁵⁴ When a medical doctor detects ill-treatment, it is important that it is immediately reported. Therefore, the Committee considered that the obligation of confidentiality should not trump the need to report torture and other forms of ill-treatment and recommended establishing a reporting obligation for medical professionals.⁵⁵

27 Detecting possible signs of torture and other forms of ill-treatment is however not always easy and requires knowledge about the methods employed in such situations (eg during interrogations) and its consequences, as well as investigative capacities. The lack of professional capacities of medical doctors and other professionals in contact with detainees and torture survivors constitute a problem in many countries.⁵⁶ Therefore, the Committee regularly emphasizes the importance of applying the 'Manual on the Effective Investigation and Documentation of Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading ⁵¹ A/56/44 (n 14) para 169; the Committee noted, in relation to Serbia and Montenegro, that under art 12, prosecutors and judges are obligated to investigate allegations of torture whenever they come to their attention, whether or not the victim has filed a formal complaint. In particular, every investigating judge, on learning from a detainee's statement that he or she has been subjected to torture, should initiate promptly an effective investigation into the matter. Investigations should be prompt, impartial, and effective: CAT, 'Report of the Committee against Torture Thirty-First Session (10-21 November 2003) Thirty-Second Session (3-21 May 2004)' (2004) UN Doc A/59/44, para 213(j); CAT, 'Report on Mexico produced by the Committee Under Article 20 of the Convention, and Reply from the Government of Mexico' (2003) UN Doc CAT/C/75, para 220 (d); CPT, 12th General Report [CPT/Inf (2002) 15], para 45; Camille Giffard, The Torture Reporting Handbook: How to Document and Respond to Allegations of Torture within the International System for the Protection of Human Rights (Human Rights Centre 2000) Part II—Documenting Allegations.

Treatment or Punishment’ (Istanbul Protocol), recommending it for the training of law enforcement officials, judges, prosecutors, forensic doctors, and medical personnel in dealing with detainees.⁵⁷

28 Another very important way to find out whether and to what extent torture and other forms of ill-treatment are practised is to establish ‘a system of regular visits undertaken by independent international and national bodies to places where people are deprived of their liberty’ as stipulated in Article 1 OPCAT. An effective and independent National Preventive Mechanism (NPM)—established in line with Article 17 OPCAT—which regularly carries out unannounced visits to every place of detention and conducts private interviews with detainees—can detect possible cases of torture and other forms of ill-treatment and refer it to an independent authority competent to proceed to a prompt and impartial investigation.⁵⁸ A Government genuinely interested in fighting impunity and investigating all suspicions of torture should also open up its detention facilities to unannounced visits by international mechanisms such as the UN Subcommittee on Prevention (SPT), the UNSRT, or competent international or domestic NGOs.

29 In practice, reporting by non-governmental organizations receiving complaints, information, and providing assistance to victims and relatives play an important role in detecting and documenting ill-treatment. This was explicitly acknowledged by the Committee in the case Khaled Ben M'Barek v Tunisia where it specifically considered reports of international NGOs alleging that the applicant died as a result of torture in detention as providing reasonable grounds to initiate an investigation.⁵⁹ Consequently, supporting an active civil society that can work without interference increases the effectiveness of the duty to investigate.

3.2 Meaning of ‘prompt investigation’

30 In the case of a suspicion of torture or ill-treatment, a prompt investigation is of particular importance ‘both to ensure that the victim cannot continue to be subjected to such acts and also because in general, unless the methods employed have permanent or serious effects, the physical traces of torture, and especially of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment, soon disappear.’⁶⁰ This naturally extends to other forms of evidence than physical traces as shown in the case Alexander Gerasimov v Kazakhstan where the Committee criticized that the results of the scientific examination of the clothes of the complainant and alleged perpetrators were compromised as it was carried out more than three months after the alleged torture and after they had been washed.⁶¹ Moreover, a prompt response to a suspicion by the authorities is essential for maintaining public confidence in the State’s adherence to the rule of law and its clear rejection of torture and other forms of ill-treatment.⁶²

31 In most cases in which the Committee found a violation of Article 12, no investigations had been carried out at all or only after long periods ranging from several months to many years.⁶³ In some cases the Committee found a violation although the State authorities claimed that the investigation was still ongoing, because it had provided no evidence helping the Committee 'to ascertain what progress has been made, to judge how effective the procedure might be or to explain the reasons for such a delay'.⁶⁴ The Committee expressly rejected the argument that the lack of progress is due to lack of co-operation of the complainant residing outside the country.⁶⁵

32 In order for an investigation to be prompt and effective, it must be initiated immediately or without any delay,⁶⁶ within hours or, at the most, few days after the suspicion of torture or ill-treatment has arisen. This is confirmed by the case Blanco Abad v Spain in which a delay of two weeks was held to constitute a violation of Article 12. The case concerned the ill-treatment of the complainant by officers of the Guardia Civil between 29 January and 2 February 1992, where she had been kept incommunicado under anti-terrorist legislation.⁶⁷ Signs of her ill-treatment were noticed by a doctor at a Women's Penitentiary Centre who had examined her upon arrival on 3 February 1992. The prison director, in complying with the relevant obligations under Articles 12 and 13, immediately brought the physician's report to the attention of the competent judge. The Committee observed that 'when, on 3 February, the physician of the penitentiary centre noted bruises and contusions on the author's body, this fact was brought to the attention of the judicial authorities. However, the competent judge did not take up the matter until 17, and February the Court initiated preliminary proceedings only on 21 February'.⁶⁸ The UNSRT has even recommended that all suspicions and allegations of torture and other ill-treatment should be investigated and documented within twenty-four hours.⁶⁹

33 An investigation must not only be initiated promptly but should also be carried out and concluded as expeditiously as possible.⁷⁰ In this regard, the Committee has criticized countries where serious accusations ‘remain at the protracted investigation stage’⁷¹ and ‘judicial procedures remain excessively long and drawn out’.⁷² In the same manner the ECtHR has not only considered the starting of the investigation but whether different investigative measures, eg taking of statements or the forensic medical examination were taken belatedly.⁷³

3.3 Meaning of ‘competent authorities’

34 While criminal investigations must necessarily lead to a decision by an independent and impartial tribunal within the meaning of Article 14 CCPR,⁷⁴ Article 12 CAT only requires a prompt and impartial investigation by a ‘competent authority’. Apart from the courts, this can also be undertaken by national human rights institutions, ombuds-institutions, detention monitoring commissions, public prosecutors, administrative agencies, and even police chiefs and prison directors, who have a genuine interest in preventing torture and other forms of ill-treatment within their respective detention facilities.

35 The Committee recommends to establish national human rights institutions (NHRI) to carry out investigations.⁷⁵ Although the Paris Principles do not specifically prescribe that NHRIs should have the mandate to receive and investigate complaints,⁷⁶ the Committee has noted with concern where the mandate ‘does not empower it to investigate action taken by the Prosecutor’s office’.⁷⁷ At the same time the Committee also expressed concern where ‘cases of torture continue to be investigated only by administrative, disciplinary or military, rather than criminal jurisdictions’.⁷⁸

36 In order to be effective any genuine investigating body must be entrusted with full investigative powers, such as summoning witnesses, interrogating the accused officials, inspecting official documents, and carrying out forensic examinations, if necessary also after the exhumation of the mortal remains of an alleged victim of torture.⁷⁹ Thus, the Committee expressed concern where investigative mechanisms are restricted in their investigative powers, eg when the prosecution service and enforcement judges have difficulties accessing prisons.⁸⁰ This is confirmed by the Istanbul Principles stating that ‘the investigative authority shall have the power and obligation to obtain all the information necessary to the inquiry' including the necessary budgetary and technical resources, the authority to summon alleged perpetrators and any witness and to demand the production of evidence.⁸¹ Thus, no legal or practical obstacles should impede investigations,⁸² such as not disclosing the identity of members of special and rapid intervention forces⁸³ or the wearing of masks by police or prison officers or blindfolding detainees making identification of perpetrators impossible.⁸⁴ A promising practice in that regard is the Police Ombudsman of Northern Ireland that is provided with the same type of powers as police officers, eg to carry out searches, seize equipment, and if necessary arrest police officers.⁸⁵ Moreover the ability to 'freeze a crime scene' once there is a suspicion of police malpractice—as granted to the Independent Commission of Investigations in Jamaica—can be very useful to avoid that potentially responsible law enforcement officials tamper with evidence.⁸⁶

37 It is of course also important that the competent authorities have the professional capacities to carry out effective investigations. This may be particularly challenging when it comes to independent external oversight bodies—such as NHRIs—that are composed of civilians rather than former investigators belonging to the state. Therefore, it is important that the investigators receive the adequate training in investigation, eg investigation planning, collecting evidence and investigative interviewing, evaluation of facts, reporting, etc.⁸⁷

3.4 Meaning of 'impartial investigation'

38 Impartiality is considered as the key requirement of the investigation process.⁸⁸ As Burgers and Danelius state 'any investigation which proceeds from the assumption that no such acts have occurred, or in which there is a desire to protect the suspected officials, cannot be considered effective'.⁸⁹

39 Article 12 does not require an investigation by an independent body, much less by a judicial body. This is confirmed by the Committee's case-law where it only finds a violation on the basis of the conduct of the investigation (how it was carried out) but not merely because of a lack of independence of the investigative body from the authorities suspected of torture or other forms of ill-treatment (by whom it is carried out). For example, in the case NZ v Kazakhstan the Committee expressed concern that the preliminary examination of complaints of torture and other forms of ill-treatment by police officers was undertaken by an entity under the same chain of command as the regular police force (Department of Internal Security—DIA) but did not find a violation due to lack of evidence that the investigation was not carried out in an impartial manner.⁹⁰ The ECtHR has taken a very similar approach to the requirement of independence of investigations. Instead of making an abstract assessment of the independence of the investigative body it examines it ‘in its entirety’ looking at its potential conflicts of interest, hierarchical relationships with potential suspects, and the specific conduct.⁹¹ This means that even where statutory independence is missing, an investigation can be sufficiently independent, although it will require a stricter scrutiny of the exact conduct of the investigation.⁹² At the same time, the Committee regularly criticizes the lack of independence of investigation mechanisms in its Concluding Observations. In the following the requirement of impartiality will be analyzed both as to the conduct of the investigation as well as the set-up of an investigation mechanism.

3.4.1 Conduct of the Investigation

40 The Committee interprets the notion of impartiality broadly and demands the investigation to be ‘effective’⁹³ and ‘thorough’,⁹⁴ as well as ‘aimed at determining the nature of the reported events, the circumstances surrounding them and the identity of whoever may have participated in them.’⁹⁵

41 For that purpose it is important that the investigation not only considers the testimony of the alleged perpetrators but also the complainants or their relatives’ statements and medical evidence.⁹⁶ In this sense, the Committee found a violation in the case Rasim Bairamov v Kazakhstan, where the investigative body relied on the testimony of the alleged perpetrators but the complainant was never questioned regarding his ill-treatment and no medical examination was carried out. Similarly, the Committee found a violation in the case Oleg Evloev v Kazakhstan because the investigation relied too heavily on the testimony of the alleged perpetrators, attaching little weight on the complainants or relatives’ statements and on the uncontested medical evidence documenting the injuries.⁹⁷ In the case NZ v Kazakhstan the investigation also relied heavily on the testimony of the police officers, but involved also the questioning of other participants in the events as well as the medical personnel who first examined the alleged victims.⁹⁸ Moreover, the investigation by the Department of Internal Security was followed by the prosecutor’s office that several times revoked its closing and returned it for additional investigation. Therefore, the Committee found that the complainant failed to substantiate that the investigation was not efficient and impartial.⁹⁹ An impartial investigation naturally also requires that it is free from any discrimination on gender, race, social origin, or any other grounds.¹⁰⁰

42 An effective and thorough investigation needs to include some minimum investigatory steps such as the questioning of the complainant about ill-treatment, a forensic-medical investigation, and the summoning of certain witnesses.¹⁰¹ The Committee found that a mere 'inspection' of a penitentiary institution can clearly not be considered an effective investigation in the sense of Article 12 CAT.¹⁰² The lack of thoroughness was particularly criticized in regard to the US inquiries into torture allegations overseas. In its Concluding Observations to the US State report the Committee noted with concern that 'some former CIA detainees, who had been held in United States custody abroad, were never interviewed during the investigations, which casts doubts as to whether that high-profile inquiry was properly conducted.'¹⁰³ On the other hand, where the decision to dismiss a complaint was based on a variety of sources, from medical reports and statements of detainees and witnesses who had no apparent conflict of interest, the Committee did not conclude that the investigation lacked impartiality.¹⁰⁴

43 In the case M'Barek v Tunisia regarding a person allegedly tortured to death, the Committee criticized that the examining magistrate failed to make use of other important investigations customarily conducted in such matters. It specifically noted that the magistrate could have checked the records of the detention centres for the presence of the complainant and witnesses, in reference to the duty to keep detention records in Principle 12 of the Body of Principles for the Protection of All Persons under Any Form of Detention or Imprisonment; sought to identify and examine the accused officials, and arrange a confrontation between them, the witnesses, and the complainant; ordered an exhumation of the victim (if possible in the presence of external experts) in view of the major disparities between the findings of forensic officials.¹⁰⁵ The Committee held that the magistrate in 'failing to investigate more thoroughly, committed a breach of the duty of impartiality imposed on him by his obligation to give equal weight to both accusation and defence during his investigation'.¹⁰⁶

44 Similar considerations were made in the case of Ristic v Yugoslavia, which concerned allegations about an act of torture by the police that resulted in the death of the victim. The Committee pointed to various inconsistencies between the official autopsy report and a report of two forensic experts made at the request of the parents of the victim, as well as between statements of the three police officers accused of having tortured the victim, and to the fact that the doctor who had carried out the official autopsy admitted that he was not a specialist in forensic medicine. Noting the above elements, the Committee concluded that ‘the investigation that was conducted by the State party’s authorities was neither effective nor thorough. A proper investigation would indeed have entailed an exhumation and a new autopsy, which would in turn have allowed the cause of death to be medically established with a satisfactory degree of certainty.’¹⁰⁷

45 A forensic medical examination is of particular importance for a thorough investigation. An important factor for the low conviction rate of perpetrators of torture and other forms of ill-treatment is the lack of evidence, particular medical evidence.¹⁰⁸ Consequently, the allegation of the survivor stands against the statement of the alleged perpetrator who is unlikely to confess and the colleagues unlikely to testify against him or her. Therefore, in its General Comment 3 to Article 14 the Committee stated that an investigation in the sense of Article 12 CAT ‘should include as a standard measure an independent physical and psychological forensic examination as provided for in the Istanbul Protocol.’¹⁰⁹ Also the UNSRT has emphasized the importance of systematically evaluating evidence by independent and impartial forensic services.¹¹⁰ It is important that such medical examination is conducted promptly, by an independent professional and in conformity with the professional standards established in the Istanbul Protocol.¹¹¹ The forensic examination should take place ‘outside the place of detention and the contents of the medical report should not be made known to the personnel responsible for police custody. In addition, persons in police custody should be able to request that a medical certificate be prepared by a doctor of their choice in any circumstances, and it should be possible for this certificate to be produced as evidence before the courts.’¹¹² The Committee has however emphasized that forensic medical reports alone are ‘often insufficient and need to be compared with other sources of information’ to determine whether torture has taken place.¹¹³

46 The Istanbul Protocol published in 1999 was developed jointly by forensic scientists, physicians, psychologists, human rights monitors, and lawyers from all over the world. It contains principles for the effective investigation and documentation of torture (Istanbul Principles) that have been endorsed by the General Assembly as well as the UN Human Rights Commission and Council.¹¹⁴ The Istanbul Protocol ‘intended to serve as international guidelines for the assessment of persons who allege torture and ill-treatment, for investigating cases of alleged torture and for reporting findings to the judiciary or any other investigative body’.¹¹⁵ It includes sections on the legal investigation of torture; holding interviews; collecting of physical and psychological evidence. Today, it is the widely recognized standard for investigations, cited by national and international courts, used for preparing medical reports, and in trainings of medical and legal professionals worldwide.¹¹⁶

47 Further guidance on what is required from a ‘thorough’ investigation can be found in the jurisprudence of the ECtHR,¹¹⁷ the IACtHR,¹¹⁸ reports of the CPT,¹¹⁹ and most specifically the Council of Europe guidelines that even provide a ‘typical inventory of required investigative measures’ such as detailed and exhaustive statements of alleged victims obtained with an appropriate degree of sensitivity; appropriate questioning and, where necessary, the use of identification parades and other special investigative measures designed to identify those responsible; confidential and accurate medical (preferably forensic) physical and psychological examinations of alleged victims (carried out by independent and adequately trained personnel); other medical evidence; appropriate witness statements, possibly including statements of other detainees, custodial staff, members of the public, law enforcement officers, and other officials; examination of the scene for material evidence, including implements used in ill-treatment, fingerprints, body fluids, and fibres that should involve the use of forensic and other specialists able to secure and examine the evidence; and examination of custody records, decisions, case files, and other documentation related to the relevant incident.¹²⁰

48 It is important that all the evidence is ‘assessed in a thorough, consistent and objective manner’.¹²¹ Therefore the existence of an independent judiciary is crucial. In several Concluding Observations to State reports the Committee expressed concern with alleged cases of ethnic bias and politically influenced judicial procedures,¹²² and where the executive branch is responsible for the appointment, promotion, and dismissal of judges or otherwise influences the judiciary.¹²³ A consequence may be that allegations

¹¹⁸ In the case Cabrera García and Montiel Flores v Mexico, Series C No 220 (IACtHR, 26 November 2010) para 135, the Court affirmed that ‘whenever there are signs that torture has taken place, the State must initiate, ex officio and immediately, an impartial, independent and thorough investigation that makes it possible to determine the nature and origin of the injuries observed’; recalled in the case of Maldonado Vargas y otros v Chile (n 66) para 76 that ‘once the state authorities have knowledge of an act that could constitute torture, they must initiate ex officio and without delay, an investigation’.

49 Another key element of an impartial and effective investigation, although not specifically mentioned in Article 12, is the involvement of the victim.¹²⁵ The Committee criticized where the complainant was not promptly informed if and who investigated the complaint, at what stage the investigation was,¹²⁶ and where no information about the outcome of the investigation and the evidence made available to the authorities was provided.¹²⁷ In the case Ali Aarrass v Morocco the Committee noted that this effectively prevented the complainant from pursuing private prosecution and thus violates Article 12 CAT.¹²⁸ The CoE Guidelines also contain this requirement providing that victims not only be informed of the investigative process and decisions made but also be entitled to request specific steps to be taken and participate in investigative actions, where appropriate. Moreover, alleged victims should be provided with legal aid, if necessary, and given the opportunity to challenge actions and omissions of investigating authorities.¹²⁹

50 In addition, the Committee also urges States parties to make the outcome of the investigation public.¹³⁰ Equally the Guidelines as well as the ECtHR and CPT require an element of public scrutiny of the investigation to secure accountability which may in particularly serious cases even require a public inquiry.¹³¹ For that purpose the Committee has recommended the establishment of a centralized public register of complaints of torture and other forms of ill-treatment and of the results of the investigation, to ensure the guarantee of an impartial and open investigation.¹³²

3.4.2 Investigation Mechanism

51 While investigations by police chiefs, prison directors, and public prosecutors are not necessarily excluded by Article 12, it is advisable not to entrust the investigation solely to persons who have close personal or professional links with the persons suspected of having committed torture or ill-treatment, or who may have an interest in protecting these persons or the particular unit to which they belong.¹³³ In this spirit the Committee did not find the absence of independent investigation mechanism to automatically constitute a violation¹³⁴ but criticizes countries where this is the case and recommends a fully 'independent mechanism' to carry out investigations in the sense of Article 12.¹³⁵

52 Investigation mechanisms should be institutionally and functionally independent. The Committee recommends that investigations into torture and other forms of ill-treatment are carried out 'by independent bodies, with no institutional or hierarchical connection between the investigators and the alleged perpetrators among the police'.¹³⁶

53 The Committee criticizes States where investigations are carried out by the regular police forces.¹³⁷ Thus, it has expressed particular concern about the lack of effective investigation 'due to the involvement of the Ministry of Interior Affairs in investigation of alleged violations by its subsidiary units, in contravention of a principle of impartiality'.¹³⁸ The State should ensure that 'investigations are never undertaken by personnel employed by the same ministry as the accused persons'.¹³⁹

54 Where investigations are carried out by the prosecution offices, this has also been criticized by the Committee.¹⁴⁰ The prosecution plays an important role in supervising investigations into torture and other forms of ill-treatment carried out by the police. This can however become problematic where it is not ensured that prosecutors investigating the crime and the allegations made against police officials are different.¹⁴¹ The Committee noted that 'the dual nature and responsibilities of the prosecution authorities for prosecution and oversight of the proper conduct of investigations are a major barrier to the impartial investigation' and recommended that investigations should not be carried out by any law enforcement agency but by an independent body.¹⁴² The Committee recommended to strengthen efficiency and independence of the prosecutor and 'ensure preservation of evidence until the arrival of the prosecutor'.¹⁴³ It noted that it is important that the Office of the Public Prosecutor is also institutionally separated from the authorities against which it will investigate, meaning it should for example not be placed within military facilities.¹⁴⁴ The personal independence of prosecutors is another important factor. A recent study comparing investigative bodies in Europe concluded that even where the police and prosecution are factually independent, their close institutional connection and feeling of collegiality diminish the impartiality of the investigation by prosecutors.¹⁴⁵

55 The Committee therefore welcomes the creation of separate investigative units under the police or prosecution although frequently noting concerns when it comes to their practical functioning. In Sweden, a Department of Special Investigations, with autonomous standing, was created within the police at the national level, including seven regional investigation units.¹⁴⁶ Kazakhstan's establishment of a special prosecutor was welcomed although the Committee expressed concerns where reports indicate that in practice most allegations of torture and other forms of ill-treatment continue to be referred to the police/same department in which the alleged perpetrator is employed.¹⁴⁷ The Committee also welcomed the creation of an Investigate Commission in Russia that is separate from the Procuracy with a subdivision tasked with investigating alleged crimes committed by law enforcement officials. However, it criticized the lack of impartiality in practice based on the actions of its head as well as the insufficient resources to effectively carry out its function.¹⁴⁸

56 A step further than separate departments or units are independent police complaints commissions or ombudsmen, entities completely independent and separate from the police mandated to receive complaints and carry out investigation ex officio.¹⁴⁹ These bodies differ in their mandate from full arrest and investigative powers to the mere right to make internal reports and recommendations, and their effectiveness has also been subject to criticism. For example, regarding Northern Ireland the Committee noted concern about 'inconsistencies in investigation processes' or regarding Ireland about the possibility to refer cases back to the Police Commissioner¹⁵⁰ as obstacles to effective investigations.

57 A particular concern regarding specialized investigation mechanisms arises about the personal independence of the investigators. For example, in its Concluding Observations to Belgium the Committee stated its concern 'by the fact that some of the investigators are former police officers, which may compromise their impartiality when they are required to conduct objective and effective investigations into allegations that acts of torture and ill-treatment have been committed by members of the police'.¹⁵¹ Following, the Committee recommends independent mechanism to 'be composed of independent experts recruited from outside the police'.¹⁵² Similarly, in its Concluding Observations to New Zealand, the Committee was concerned 'that the impartiality of the Independent Police Conduct Authority might be hampered by the inclusion of both current and former police officers'.¹⁵³ Consequently, regarding Ireland the Committee welcomed that the members of the Police Ombudsman 'cannot be serving members or former members of the Garda Síochána'.¹⁵⁴ An independent comparative study mirrored these views and concluded that unless 'cathartic social circumstances prevail, the employment of retired or seconded police officers is not a desirable solution for obvious loyalties may arise even if the persons investigating police violations come from different units.¹⁵⁵

58 The UNSRT has also continuously stated that the main obstacle to an effective and impartial investigation was the fact that the same institution is responsible for investigating and prosecuting ordinary crimes and those committed by members of the investigating and prosecuting institutions leading to a lack transparency and a conflict of interest.¹⁵⁶ Therefore the UNSRT recommended that '[a]llegations of torture and other ill-treatment should be investigated by an external investigative body, independent from those implicated in the allegation and with no institutional or hierarchical connection between the investigators and the alleged perpetrators'.¹⁵⁷ The most recent soft law instrument on the rights of detainees, UN Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners (Nelson Mandela Rules) explicitly state that a prompt and impartial investigation shall be 'conducted by an independent national authority'.¹⁵⁸

59 The Istanbul Principles affirm that investigators 'shall be independent of the suspected perpetrators'¹⁵⁹ and moreover provide that in cases where the existing investigative procedures are inadequate or where there is a pattern of widespread torture and other forms of ill-treatment, it may be useful to consider establishing a special independent Commission of Inquiry.¹⁶⁰ This may also complement investigations, especially where there is a lack of specific information, the capacities of the regular mechanisms are exhausted, and where a deeper understanding of the origin of the violations and ways to prevent them in the future is needed. The UNSRT has provided detailed guidance on the set-up of Commissions of Inquiries.¹⁶¹

60 It follows that in principle an investigation in order to be effective and impartial, should be entrusted to an independent external body without direct links to the unit in which the act of torture or ill-treatment allegedly took place. This is confirmed by the findings of a global study on the effectiveness of torture prevention measures concluding that only where the law requires the investigation by an independent body there is evidence that this has an impact on the incidence of torture.¹⁶²

Right of Victims to Complain

Each State Party shall ensure that any individual who alleges he has been subjected to torture in any territory under its jurisdiction has the right to complain to, and to have his case promptly and impartially examined by, its competent authorities. Steps shall be taken to ensure that the complainant and witnesses are protected against all ill-treatment or intimidation as a consequence of his complaint or any evidence given.

1. Introduction

1 While Article 12 requires States parties to carry out ex officio investigations whenever there is a suspicion of torture or other forms of ill-treatment, Article 13 requires such investigation in response to a complaint by the victim.¹ Such a duty presupposes, that every person alleging to be a victim of torture and ill-treatment enjoys an effective right to complain to a competent body without fear of reprisals. This in turn is only possible if the State party takes the necessary measures to protect both the complainant and witnesses against ill-treatment and intimidation as a consequence of such complaint or witness testimony. Whereas the right to complain and the obligation of an impartial examination of such complaints is already included in Article 8 of the 1975 Declaration, the special protection of the complainant was added by the Swedish draft. The additional protection of witnesses was inserted by the Working Group in 1980.²

2 Contrary to the obligation to conduct criminal investigations against alleged perpetrators present in the territory of a State party which only applies to torture in the narrow sense of Article 1, the prompt and thorough investigation duties under Articles 12 and 13 also apply to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment by virtue of the express reference in Article 16(1).

3 The phrase ‘in any territory under its jurisdiction’ shall be interpreted in the same broad sense as in Article 2(1), ‘to protect any person, citizen or non-citizen without discrimination subject to the jure or de facto control of a State party’.³

4 Article 13 constitutes the basic remedy of torture victims, and is aimed at having the facts established by a competent and independent authority. Depending on the facts of the case, a complaint may also lead to further action to bring the perpetrators to justice under criminal law (Articles 4 to 9). Moreover, a complaint is not only an important trigger for an investigation by the authorities but also an important chance for victims to express dissatisfaction and disapproval with their treatment and may thus contribute to the reestablishment of their sense of control and dignity.⁴ It can be a crucial first step for a torture survivor to be provided with other forms of reparation under civil law or rehabilitation pursuant to Article 14. In that sense the right to complain is a measure of reparation in itself and the obligation part of the procedural aspect of the right to redress in article 14.⁵ The interlink between Articles 12, 13, and 14 was also underlined by the Committee in its General Comment 3 to Article 14.⁶

5 In the jurisprudence of the Committee, decisions on Articles 12 and 13 usually go hand in hand. The Committee does not clearly differentiate between the two articles in a way to only apply Article 13 to cases where a complaint was made and Article 12 to cases in which an investigation was undertaken ex officio. Instead, in cases in which the State party failed to take appropriate action in response to a complaint, the Committee’s mainly examines the case in the light of Article 12 while finding a violation of Article 13 without further reasoning⁷ or simply stating that it ‘presupposes that the authorities provide a satisfactory response to such a complaint by launching a prompt and impartial investigation’.⁸

6 Besides the CAT the right to complain is also explicitly mentioned in Article 8 of the Inter-America Convention to Prevent and Punish Torture. Moreover, the Human Rights Committee and European Court of Human Rights have interpreted it as a procedural obligation of the prohibition of torture and ill-treatment⁹ and it is repeated in numerous soft law documents.¹⁰

7 In practice, there are great challenges in the implementation of the right to complain. In many countries there are no clearly designated complaint mechanisms and where complaints mechanisms exist, they all too often lack independence and effectiveness. Moreover, detainees are not or insufficiently aware of the possibility to complain, have difficulties accessing complaints mechanisms (eg due to practical obstacles, inadequate legal proceedings, and the lack of effective legal aid), mistrust their effectiveness, or refrain from making complaints in fear of reprisals.¹¹ In resume of his six years as Special Rapporteur on Torture, Manfred Nowak stated that he ‘can hardly think of any other safeguard where the legally required protection and the actual reality differ in such a glaring and devastating way.’¹²

Article 12

Each State Party shall ensure that any individual who alleges he has been subjected to torture in any territory under its jurisdiction has the right to complain to and to have his case impartially examined by its competent authorities. Steps shall be taken to ensure that the complainant is protected against ill-treatment in consequence of his complaint.

2.2 Analysis of Working Group Discussions

13 In written comments on Article 9 of the original Swedish draft, Austria suggested that 'the right to an effective remedy before a national authority' replace the words 'the right to complain to'. It was further suggested by Austria, together with Denmark, that the words 'without threat of further torture or other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment' be deleted, since, in the opinion of Denmark, they gave a false impression that forms of threat other than torture might be used. The United States proposed a new Article which would incorporate the concepts contained in Articles 9 and 10 (the right to complain).¹⁸ The United Kingdom proposed that the word 'jurisdiction' be deleted and replaced by 'territory' and further that the words 'without threat of further torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment' in line 5 be omitted.¹⁹

¹⁹ Summary by the Secretary-General in Accordance with Resolution 18 (XXXIV) of the Commission on Human Rights (1979) UN Doc E/CN.4/1314/Add.1.

14 Article 9 was renumbered Article 12 in the revised Swedish draft. During the discussion in the 1980 Working Group it was suggested that Articles 12 and 13 be reversed. The rationale of the representative who made this proposal was that the prevention and punishment of acts of torture were primarily the responsibility of the Governments of States parties and not that of the victim, who may not be in a position to make complaints. The Working Group agreed to this proposal. It was pointed out by the same representative that it was necessary to ensure the protection not only of the complainant but also of any witnesses against ill-treatment in retaliation for the complaint made or testimony given. Several representatives suggested that this was necessary in order to encourage witnesses to put themselves at the disposal of the competent authorities. In this connection, one representative proposed that the words ‘or intimidation’, ‘and witnesses’, and ‘or any evidence given’ should be inserted in the last sentence of Article 12.²⁰

15 In response to the question on the scope of the phrase ‘territory under its jurisdiction’, it was said that it was intended to cover, inter alia, territories still under colonial rule and occupied territories.

3. Issues of Interpretation

3.1 Meaning of ‘right to complain’

16 The text of Article 13 indicates that ‘any individual who alleges’ that he or she has been subjected to torture or other forms of ill-treatment has an independent right to complain to a competent authority. This wording must be understood broadly, neither requiring a specific form, nor an expression of intent to initiate criminal proceedings.²¹ The victim only needs to bring the matter to the attention of the authorities for the State to be under an obligation to investigate.²² In the early case of Parot v Spain, the Committee noted that ‘in principle, article 13 of the Convention does not require the formal submission of a complaint of torture. It is sufficient for torture only to have been alleged by the victim for the state to be under an obligation to promptly and impartially examine the allegation.’²³ This was confirmed in the case Blanco Abad v. Spain where the Committee stated that the ‘Convention does not require either the formal lodging of a complaint of torture under the procedure laid down in national law or an express statement of intent to institute and sustain a criminal action arising from the offence, and that it is enough for the victim simply to bring the facts to the attention of an authority of the State for the latter to be obliged to consider it as a tacit but unequivocal expression of the victim’s wish that the facts should be promptly and impartially investigated, as prescribed by this provision of the Convention.’²⁴ This liberal interpretation, which clearly conforms to the object and purpose of this provision, was confirmed in later cases against *Tunisia*²⁵ and Serbia and Montenegro.²⁶

17 Article 13 only speaks of a right of an alleged victim to bring forward a complaint ('any individual who alleges'). Contrary to that Article 22 explicitly states that complaints may be submitted 'on behalf of individuals' and the Rules of Procedure state that "[t]he complaint should be submitted by the individual himself/herself or by his/her relatives or designated representatives, or by others on behalf of an alleged victim when it appears that the victim is unable personally to submit the complaint".²⁷ Also other international standards explicitly extend the right to submit a complaint to the legal counsel or members of the family whenever it cannot be exercised by the victim.²⁸ Although it appears that the Committee has not expressed itself on the issue, it is not reasonable to interpret the right to complain restrictively, limiting it to the person alleging to be a victim only. Otherwise it could be easily rendered ineffective.

18 It is not sufficient that the right is legally guaranteed, it must also be accessible and effective in practice. In the State reporting procedure, the Committee expressed concerns about undue restrictions of the right to complain, such as not accepting complaints directly from alleged victims but only upon referral by other mechanisms,²⁹ a statute of limitation of thirty-five days for complaining,³⁰ the imposition of strict criteria for the substantiation of complaints,³¹ the lack of access to pen and papers in places of detention,³² high fees charged by medical professionals to complete the complaint form, and the insistence that the form must first be filled out at the police station.³³ It also criticized situations when police officers using excessive force during demonstrations cannot be identified because they wear masks or do not carry identification badges.³⁴ Making a complaint should not impose unnecessary hardship on complainants and their relatives that prevents or discourages them from seeking redress, such as financial burden. States need to provide assistance and support to minimize any hardship.³⁵ Complaints forms need to be made available free of charge and States need to ensure that that the right of a complainant is not dependent on his or her economic situation.³⁶ In general, the right to lodge a complaint and the corresponding State obligation to carry out a prompt and impartial investigation should not be dependent on any discretion of State authorities.³⁷

19 States must provide the necessary procedures for victims of torture and ill-treatment to exercise their right to complain in a non-bureaucratic manner without fear of reprisals.

Particular measures need to be taken in relation to detainees. In places of detention, there should be the possibility to lodge both oral and written, ideally even anonymous, complaints. Internal mechanisms should be immediately accessible to detainees on a daily basis.³⁸ Complaints need to be responded to as quickly as possible and forwarded to the competent investigation body.³⁹ In principle, every person working in a detention facility has the obligation to forward a complaint to a competent authority. Unless a special procedure has been established to receive such complaints, this may be doctors who carry out medical examinations, prison chaplains, social workers, or resident prosecutors. In addition, every prisoner shall be allowed to make a request or complaint regarding his or her treatment, without censorship as to substance, to the central prison administration, specifically where a complaint is sensitive or not resolved.⁴⁰ The Committee noted that different internal and external inspection services of the police and prison administration competent to receive complaints may create a 'lack of clarity' when lodging a complaint.⁴¹ Thus, it recommended that States establish a central mechanism specifically devoted to allegations of torture and other forms of ill-treatment.⁴²

20 Detainees should also be informed about their right to complain about torture and ill-treatment and about the respective procedures available to them in a language they understand, including an oral explanation.⁴³ The Committee expressed concern where victims are not aware of complaints procedures beyond reporting to the police who may refuse to accept them.⁴⁴ Moreover, the information could be facilitated by numerous measures such as displaying posters in police stations and communal areas of places of detention, a section on complaints procedures in the establishment's house rules, information leaflets issued by complaints bodies, or information videos.⁴⁵ Effective procedural rights, such as prompt access to family members, counsel and a doctor of their choice, as well as the right to lodge a writ of habeas corpus to an independent judge further facilitate the exercise of the right to complain about torture and other forms of ill-treatment.⁴⁶

boxes in appropriate areas. Complaints should only be accessed by persons who can ensure confidentiality and should not be filtered by staff who have control over detainees.⁴⁸ The prohibition of punishment and duty to protect from reprisals is especially important to ensure the accessibility of complaints mechanisms and is therefore explicitly mentioned in Article 13 (see below).⁴⁹ Complaints mechanisms must be made known and accessible to the public and persons deprived of liberty through wide publication and display in all places of detention.⁵⁰ Accessibility should be ensured by means such as telephone hotlines or confidential complaints boxes in detention facilities.⁵¹ In Georgia, for example the Committee against Torture appreciated the existence of a twenty-four-hour hotline for torture-related complaints and stressed the importance of disseminating information about its availability.⁵²

22 Victims should receive adequate assistance to bring forward complaints, notably professionally qualified legal advice and assistance.⁵³ Where they lack the necessary resources to make complaints, they should be provided with adequate legal aid and should be granted access to all relevant evidence or information concerning the acts of torture or ill-treatment.⁵⁴ In Mounir Hammouche v Tunisia the State refused to provide a copy of the autopsy report and denied access to the results of an investigation, both of which had been allegedly issued regarding the death of the torture victim. As an investigation was allegedly already under way, Tunisia has precluded the possibility of any criminal action to be brought by the family thus violating Article 13.⁵⁵

23 Specific measures should be taken for persons in a situation of vulnerability, including those with limited communication abilities.⁵⁶ The complaints mechanisms should be appropriately adapted to be accessible to people with particular needs, such as juveniles and persons with psychosocial and/or learning disabilities. Appropriate measures include the possibility of being assisted by a person or body that can help them to understand and exercise their rights,⁵⁷ providing information in written, oral, easy-to-read-formats, Braille, sign languages, displaying it prominently in all places of deprivation of liberty, and, with regards to indigent persons providing them with writing material, envelopes, and postage free of charge.⁵⁸ The positive measures should take into account gender aspects, ensuring that victims of sexual and gender-based violence are able to bring forward their complaints.⁵⁹ enforcement, police, military, and prison staff.⁶⁰ For that purpose it recommends setting up a centralized public register of all complaints launched, including information ‘on the corresponding investigations, trials and criminal and/or disciplinary penalties imposed’⁶¹ and on means of redress, including compensation and rehabilitation provided to the victims.⁶² In some cases, the Committee also recommended that this information should specify details, such as the sex, age, ethnicity, and (alleged) crime of the complainant and/or which authority conducted the investigation following the complaint.⁶³ Such data collection has the purpose to assist in and facilitate the monitoring of the implementation of the Convention.⁶⁴

3.2 Meaning of ‘promptly and impartially examined by competent authorities’

25 While ex officio investigations under Article 12 depend on the existence of a ‘reasonable ground to believe’ that an act of torture or ill-treatment has been committed, the duty to investigate under Article 13 is triggered by the mere allegation by a victim.⁶⁵ This does, of course, not preclude the quick closure of such an investigation if it appears, on the basis of reliable facts, that the complaint is fabricated or clearly unfounded.⁶⁶ But, as a minimum, the competent authorities shall hear the complainant and enable a doctor to examine him or her.⁶⁷

26 All complaints about torture shall be examined and investigated promptly and impartially by competent authorities. As mentioned above the Committee has rarely considered a violation of Article 13 separately from Article 12. Since the standards of investigations seem to be the same as under Article 12, reference may be made to the relevant chapters.⁶⁸ Equal to Article 12, Article 13 does not specify what is understood by ‘competent authorities’.⁶⁹ However, this should be understood broadly to include detention authorities, higher authorities, or where necessary authorities vested with reviewing or remedial powers.⁷⁰ The Committee emphasized that victims should have the possibility to access both internal mechanism as well as independent external mechanisms such as Ombudspersons, prison inspectors, independent police complaints bodies, special prosecutors or judges, administrative courts, and non-governmental organizations.⁷¹

27 The former UNSRT Juan Méndez has criticized that in many States complaints mechanisms lack independence and effectiveness as they are not ‘sufficiently detached from the authority alleged to have perpetrated the ill-treatment to be deemed impartial’.⁷² Also Manfred Nowak at the end of his mandate as UNSRT concluded that ‘most complaints mechanisms are marred by an “impenetrable wall of conflicting interests” and lack of independence.’⁷³ In the case Slobodan and Ljiljana Nikolic v Serbia and Montenegro the Committee found a violation of Article 13 due to the failure of the national courts to examine the case impartially. It argued that they based their decision to dismiss the complaint ‘exclusively on evidence that had been challenged by the complainants and which, according to them, was flawed by numerous inconsistencies’ without addressing these arguments.⁷⁴

28 The Committee and UNSRT generally recommend the establishment of independent complaints mechanisms.⁷⁵ The Committee calls for the establishment and adequate financing of National Human Rights Institutions that handle complaints.⁷⁶ Their advantage is their accessibility and semi-formal character while their disadvantage is that they cannot hand down a binding and enforceable decision but merely a recommendation. Consequently, a recent comparative study found that they have little impact on the prevention of torture unless they are organically linked to judicial investigation and prosecution.⁷⁷ As independent human rights institutions such as Ombuds-institutions or monitoring commissions usually lack full powers of criminal investigations, former UNSRT Manfred Nowak has recommended the establishment of a truly independent ‘police-police’ as they may be in a better position to collect the necessary evidence.⁷⁸ Few countries have specialized police complaints commissions or ombudsmen, entities completely independent and separate from the police mandated to receive complaints and carry out investigation ex officio.⁷⁹

28 If a complaint is rejected, reasons should be provided to the complainant and he or she should consequently have the right to review to an independent authority.⁸⁰ The Committee stated that a lack of action on the part of the victim could not excuse failings by the State party in the investigation of accusations of torture.⁸¹ Even less should a complainant's political activity impede the consideration of the complaint.⁸²

29 The victim also has the right to be informed of the outcome of the complaint within an appropriate timeframe, whether an investigation was initiated and at what stage it stands.⁸³ In several cases the Committee found that Article 13 had been violated because the State did not inform the victims of the results of the investigation and this effectively prevented them from privately initiating a prosecution that the prosecuting authority representing the state has failed to pursue ('private prosecution').⁸⁴

3.3 Meaning of 'protected against all ill-treatment or intimidation'

30 Since both victims and witnesses of an act of torture or ill-treatment are often afraid to complain and respectively provide evidence, the right to complain and the corresponding State obligation to investigate necessarily imply the obligation of States to protect complainants and witnesses against such reprisals. This is particularly important for detainees. The original Swedish draft had contained the phrase 'without threat of further torture or other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment'. Despite the proposal by Austria and Denmark to delete this phrase, it was strengthened in the revised Swedish draft by a separate sentence requiring States parties to protect the complainant against 'ill-treatment in consequence of his complaint'. During the discussions in the Working Group in 1980 this sentence was further strengthened by also including the protection of witnesses against ill-treatment and intimidation.⁸⁵

31 Many victims do not believe that making a complaint will have any effect or are afraid of suffering negative consequences. The fear of reprisals is one of the main reasons for the few complaints lodged in so many countries.⁸⁶ Effectively fighting against impunity presupposes a functioning criminal justice system. Victim and witness protection are an important element of such a system and thus a precondition for justice.⁸⁷

32 The Committee has made clear that 'reprisals constitute a form of cruel treatment or punishment under article 16 of the Convention and may amount to torture in certain circumstances.'⁸⁸ Article 13 speaks of 'ill-treatment or intimidation'. Thus, complainants and victims also have to be protected from treatment falling below the threshold of ill-treatment. In the case Ennâma Asfari v Morocco the Committee found 'threats following the complaint filed' sufficient to constitute a violation of Article 13.⁸⁹ The Committee has moreover expressed concern that victims declined to file a complaint against the police out of fear of counter-complaints by the police or other forms of reprisals.⁹⁰

33 In the case Alexander Gerasimov v Kazakhstan the Committee declared the State to have violated its obligation to protect the complainant from threats and attempts of bribery made by law enforcement to the complainant and his family during the investigations with the aim to withdraw his complaint. These included inter alia threatening to reopen an earlier investigation, to carry out a psychiatric evaluation to determine incapacity to perceive the circumstances relevant to the case, and threats of retaliation against the family. The Committee also took into account the UNSRT's report on the existence of a pattern and practice of intimidation in the country.⁹¹

34 Although Article 13 only speaks of victims and witnesses, the Committee has also raised concerns about harassment and intimidation of other actors such as journalists, lawyers, medical experts, and human rights defenders who report torture or ill-treatment.⁹² In the case of Ennâma Asfari v Morocco the Committee noted that the arrest and expulsion of the complainant's lawyer constituted a violation of Article 13 due to his representation in connection with the denunciation of torture.⁹³ Equally in the case Déogratias Niyonzima v Burundi, the Committee found the threats to the complainant and his family as well as the arrest of his lawyer violated Article 13.⁹⁴

35 Reprisals for those who cooperate with the UN on human rights has received increased attention over the last years and efforts to put an end to this are led by the highest level in the UN.⁹⁵ In 2013, the Committee made a statement on reprisals and designated rapporteurs to follow up on any such allegations.⁹⁶ Further, in 2015, both the Committee and the SPT adopted guidelines on the receipt and handling of allegations of reprisals against individuals and organizations cooperating with them.⁹⁷ In the same year the chairs of ten UN treaty bodies met to condemn intimidation and reprisals against individuals and groups who cooperate with the expert committees and endorsed protection and prevention guidelines. The Guidelines against Intimidation or Reprisals (San José Guidelines) set out approaches and actions and preventive measures for the Treaty Body System.⁹⁸

36 The Committee has regularly criticized the lack of victim and witness protection in law and practice and called for States to take adequate measures.⁹⁹ Article 13 requires that ‘steps shall be taken’ by States parties to ensure victim and witness protection without further elaborating on what this means. Recommended steps are to suspend the suspected officials from duty and to ensure that they have no involvement in the investigation and no contact with the witnesses, the victim, or the victim’s family, moving the person who made the complaint to a safe location, change of identity, providing on-site security, hotlines, and judicial orders of protection to prevent violence and harassment against complainants, witnesses, or close associates of such parties, or to assign special personnel to victims and witnesses and to arrange for regular examinations by doctors in places of detention.¹⁰⁰

37 The Committee emphasized the importance of investigating all reports of intimidation of witnesses and setting up an appropriate protective mechanism.¹⁰¹ The ICTY, ICTR, and ICC have developed extensive programmes for the protection of victims and witnesses that may be used as a model for States in order to protect victims and witnesses of torture.¹⁰² For instance, according to Article 43(6) of the Rome Statute of the ICC:

The Registrar shall set up a Victims and Witnesses Unit within the Registry. This Unit shall provide, in consultation with the Office of the Prosecutor, protective measures and security arrangements, counselling and other appropriate assistance for witnesses, victims who appear before the Court, and others who are at risk on account of testimony given by such witnesses. The Unit shall include staff with expertise in trauma, including trauma related to crimes of sexual violence.

Article 14

Right of Torture Victims to Adequate Remedy and Reparation

1. Each State Party shall ensure in its legal system that the victim of an act of torture obtains redress and has an enforceable right to fair and adequate compensation, including the means for as full rehabilitation as possible. In the event of the death of the victim as a result of an act of torture, his dependants shall be entitled to compensation.
2. Nothing in this article shall affect any right of the victim or other persons to compensation which may exist under national law.

1. Introduction

1 Article 14 aims at restoring victims' dignity and preventing the reoccurrence of acts in contravention of the Convention in the future through the provision of full redress. The right to a remedy and to reparations enshrined in Article 14 is closely interrelated with a number of other provisions of the Convention. Articles 4 to 9, concerned with bringing the perpetrators to justice under criminal law, are linked to reparations in that they provide victims with a sense of satisfaction and justice and contribute to protecting their right to know the truth. Equally, prompt, effective, and impartial investigations into allegations of torture as required by Article 12 constitute a basic remedy, as well as the impartial and effective complaints mechanisms required by Article 13. Full redress can only be obtained if the obligations under Articles 12 and 13 are met. Therefore, a failure of States parties to undertake prompt and impartial investigations whenever reasonable grounds exist that an act of torture or other forms of ill-treatment has been committed also violates Article 14.

2 Although Article 14 speaks of 'redress' and 'compensation', the contemporary terminology, as laid down in General Comment No 3 of 2012 and the UN Basic Principles and Guidelines on the Right to a Remedy and Reparation for Victims of Gross Violations of International Human Rights Law and Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law refers to the right to redress as comprising the procedural notion of an effective remedy and the substantive notion of reparation.

3 When providing redress, States parties have to adopt a victim-centred, gender-sensitive, and non-discriminatory approach and ensure that victims can participate in judicial or administrative proceedings, and that the outcome of redress procedures is tailored to their specific needs. National legislations must comprise specific provisions on the right to redress for victims of torture and other forms of ill-treatment as well as accessible procedures and mechanisms that guarantee an effective implementation of this right. Full redress includes five forms of reparation: restitution, compensation, rehabilitation, satisfaction, and guarantees of non-repetition. The provision of financial compensation as sole measure is insufficient to meet States parties' obligations under Article 14. States parties must ensure as full rehabilitation as possible to torture victims, including medical and psychological care as well as legal and social services.

Article 12

Each State Party shall guarantee an enforceable right to compensation to the victim of an act of torture or other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment committed by or at the instigation of its public officials. In the event of the death of the victim, his relatives or other successors shall be entitled to enforce this right to compensation.

7 *Revised Swedish Draft (19 February 1979)*⁴

Article 14

(1) Each State Party shall ensure that the victim of an act of torture has an enforceable right to compensation. In the event of the death of the victim as a result of an act of torture, his dependents shall be entitled to compensation.

(2) Nothing in this Article shall affect any other right to compensation which may exist under national law.

2.2 Analysis of Working Group Discussions

8 Commenting on Article 12 of the draft Swedish Convention,⁵ Austria considered that the right to compensation should be ‘as comprehensive as possible’⁶. According to the delegation, in the event of death of the victim an enforceable right of any relatives to compensation with respect to alimony should be limited to cases where the victim was legally obliged to pay such alimony; all other forms of claims for compensation—with the exception of those of a purely personal nature—should be open to his heirs as successors. The United States proposed that the text of Article 12 be redrafted as follows in order to clarify the group of people who may enforce the victim’s right to compensation in the event of his death by substituting ‘heirs, dependants, or successors’ for ‘relatives or other successors’:

Each State Party shall take such measures as may be necessary to assure an enforceable right to compensation to the victim of an act of torture committed by or with the consent or acquiescence of its public officials. In the event of the death of the victim, his heirs, dependants or successors shall be entitled to enforce this right.

The United States further made clear that in their opinion the right to compensation should be limited to victims of torture.⁷

9 The United Kingdom suggested that the word 'relatives' should be replaced by the word 'dependants'.⁸ Barbados thought that it should be specified whether the State, public official, or individual is liable to pay compensation.⁹

10 In the 1980 Working Group, discussions were held on the basis of the revised Swedish draft text.¹⁰ Various suggestions were made to rephrase the first sentence of paragraph 1. In order to make it more precise, a representative proposed the insertion of the phrase 'in its legal system' after the word 'ensure'. Several representatives felt that in the special case of victims of acts of torture, there was a need to strengthen their right to compensation. They suggested that the phrase 'an enforceable right to compensation' should be replaced by the words 'an enforceable right to fair and adequate compensation'. According to some speakers, the experience of physicians had shown that there were deep physical and psychological sequelae to torture long after the acts had been perpetrated. One-time monetary compensation might not suffice to erase these sequelae and remedy the damage done. Most representatives agreed with the idea to add the words 'including the means for his rehabilitation' after the word 'compensation' in paragraph 1 of Article 14.

11 Several representatives stated that they had difficulties with the term 'rehabilitation', which they regarded as vague and ambivalent, as, in their view, this term might encompass a variety of meanings of a juridical, sociological, and medical nature. An alternative, suggested by one representative, was to add the words 'including medical measures required by his physical and mental state of health'. One delegate drew the attention of the Working Group to the term 'rehabilitation' as used in GA Resolution 34/154 on the International Year of Disabled Persons of 17 December 1979 and proposed that the word 'rehabilitation' should be interpreted in the way that it was understood in that resolution. Several delegates opposed any reference to GA Resolution 34/154 in the text of the Convention for the reason that it was not good legal practice to incorporate a non-binding resolution in an international treaty that imposes binding legal obligations upon States. The Group considered it necessary to put the term 'rehabilitation' in square brackets and to revert to it at a later stage of the discussion in order to reach a common understanding. Some representatives felt that there was a need to extend the scope of the provision concerning persons who, in the event of the death of the victim as a result of an act of torture, shall be entitled to compensation. Reference was made to the case of a friend or neighbour helping a tortured person and giving him financial assistance before he died. One delegate proposed that the words 'or any other person designated by national law' should be added after the word 'dependants'.

12 The Working Group agreed that paragraph 2 of Article 14 should be redrafted as follows: 'Nothing in this article shall affect any right of the victim or other persons to compensation which may exist under national law.'

¹⁰ Report of the Working Group of the Commission on Human Rights (1980) UN Doc E/CN.4/1367, paras 13–14.

13 One delegate who, in the early discussions, had reserved his position on Article 14, subsequently withdrew his reservation. Therefore Article 14 as amended was adopted as follows:

1. Each State Party shall ensure in its legal system that the victim of an act of torture be redressed and have an enforceable right to fair and adequate compensation including the means for his [rehabilitation]. In the event of the death of the victim as a result of an act of torture, his dependents shall be entitled to compensation.
2. Nothing in this Article shall affect any other right of the victim or other persons to compensation which may exist under national law.

14 It was proposed that a reference be made to Article 14 in the text of Article 16(1) with the effect of extending the scope of Article 14 to include compensation for victims not only of torture but also of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. The proposed text of Article 16(1) with a reference to Article 14 enclosed in square brackets appeared as follows:

Each State Party shall undertake to prevent in any territory under its jurisdiction other acts of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment which do not constitute torture as defined in Article 1, when such acts are committed by or at the instigation of or with the consent or acquiescence of a public official or other person acting in an official capacity. In particular, the obligations contained in Articles [3], 10, 11, 12, 13, [14] and [15] shall apply with the substitution for references to torture of references to other forms of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.¹¹

15 During the 1981 Working Group the discussion on Article 14 was mainly concerned with the word 'rehabilitation' between square brackets. The Group decided to qualify that word by adopting the expression 'for as full rehabilitation as possible'. The Group also decided to place the words 'dans son système juridique', in the French text, after the word 'garanti'. In addition, a proposal by the Netherlands to insert the words 'committed in any territory under its jurisdiction' after the word 'torture' was adopted by the Group.¹² However, this phrase disappeared from the text and neither the travaux nor the commentary provide any insight as to why it was deleted.¹³

16 The Working Group adopted Article 14, as thus revised, by consensus; it now read as follows:

1. Each State Party shall ensure in its legal system that the victim of an act of torture committed in any territory under its jurisdiction be redressed and have an enforceable right to fair and adequate compensation including the means for as full rehabilitation as possible. In the event of the death of the victim as a result of an act of torture, his dependants shall be entitled to compensation.
2. Nothing in this article shall affect any other right of the victim or other persons to compensation which may exist under national law.

17 The Indian delegation asked that reference be made in the report to the reservation concerning Article 14 which it had entered the previous year.

18 Debate on the scope of the proposed Article 16 and in particular its reference to Article 14 continued in the 1981 Working Group. Some delegates were of the opinion that no reference should be made to Article 14. After discussion, the Working Group decided to retain the reference to Article 14, between square brackets. Article 16(1) and (2) was adopted.

19 The 1982 Working Group considered Article 14, provisionally agreed to in the previous year, and decided to retain it as it stood. One delegation asked that reference be made in the report to the reservation concerning Article 14 which it had entered at the two previous sessions.¹⁴

20 As regards the reference to Article 14 in Article 16(1) regarding compensation some speakers, referring to Article 11 of the Declaration, favoured a reference on the grounds that victims of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment may have a legitimate claim to compensation. Other representatives did not feel that extension of the scope of their compensation laws to an ill-defined field to include all such treatments would be warranted. Since no consensus could be reached, the Group decided to revert to this question at a later stage.¹⁵ No consensus was possible either at the 1983 Working Group.

21 It was not possible during the pre-sessional meetings to the 1984 Working Group to reach agreement on the question of including a reference to Article 14 in Article 16(1). Inclusion was firmly opposed by the delegations of the United Kingdom and the United States. Most non-Western delegations participating in the Working Group had no strong preference for including or excluding a reference to Article 14 in Article 16(1).¹⁶ Several delegates expressed themselves in favour of including the reference to Article 14 in Article 16(1) while other speakers opposed the reference, fearing that the concept of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment was too imprecise as a basis for an enforceable right to compensation and might lead to difficulties of interpretation and possible abuses. While one representative suggested that the Working Group might try again to agree on a definition of this concept, others, who were in favour of including the reference, expressed the opinion that a definition was not necessary and that each country would develop its own case law on this matter. India again asked that reference be made in the report to the general reservation concerning Article 14 which her delegation had entered at the previous session.

22 The representative of Spain proposed the inclusion of references to Articles 3, 14, and 15 in Article 16(1), in order for the mechanism of protection to be in harmony with the title of the Convention itself which included 'other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment', arguing that if reference to these three Articles was not acceptable to the Working Group, then the second sentence of paragraph 1 should be deleted. One other representative also proposed the deletion of the second sentence. In light of the ensuing discussion and in view of the fact that some of these issues had been debated in the past, the representative of Spain, in a spirit of compromise, withdrew his proposal.

23 The representative of the USSR, in an effort to help overcome the difficulties that divided the Western delegations, suggested that the obligation of Article 14 would apply to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment only in the event that such treatment caused its victims material damage and damage to the health of a person.¹⁷ In other words, this obligation would not apply to 'moral damages'. After further consultations, the Chairman-Rapporteur noted that several delegations which had favoured the inclusion of a reference to Article 14 had now indicated that they would not insist on such a reference if it created an obstacle to reaching agreement on draft Article 16. At its eleventh meeting, the Working Group decided to adopt draft Article 16, limiting the reference in the first paragraph to 'Articles 10, 11, 12 and 13'.

24 The delegations of Canada and Ireland stated that they had not opposed the adoption of Article 16, but that they wished to see registered in the report that their Governments retained a strong preference for including a reference to Article 14 in this Article. In written comments the representative for Canada outlined that his delegation had made considerable concessions in the Working Group, 'particularly in the matter of compensation for victims of cruel or degrading treatment and that the very definition of torture did not seem to his delegation to go far enough'.¹⁸

25 The delegation of the USSR, drawing attention to the fact that Article 16 was the only provision referring to acts of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment which did not amount to torture, expressed the view that the provision should have been presented in a more detailed way, with a more precise definition, so that the Article would have a stronger effect. To this end the delegation had proposed reproducing the provisions of other instruments which had binding force for States parties.¹⁹ The delegation, considering it possible to adopt Article 16 without a reference to Article 14, stated that it would not insist on its proposal. However, it emphasized that, if in the course of the further consideration of Article 16 some delegations again raised the question of the necessity of including a reference to Article 14 in Article 16, it would return to its proposal.²⁰

26 Denmark, referring to its contribution to the UN Voluntary Fund for Victims of Torture, stated that besides financial contributions, it was also necessary to provide medical and social assistance to victims of torture.²¹

27 In written comments Tonga reserved its final position with respect to States parties ensuring that the victims not only of torture but also of other acts of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment obtain redress and have an enforceable right to fair and adequate compensation.²²

At the end of the paragraph, add the sentence: "The obligation contained in Article 14 shall apply with the substitution indicated above in the event that such treatment or punishment caused its victim material loss or loss of health"; 3. After the first paragraph, insert a new paragraph: "2. In the determination of acts referred to in paragraph 1 of this article, each State Party shall act in accordance with the relevant international agreements binding on it and its national law"; 4. 2.3 Reservations, Declarations, and Understandings

28 Upon accession to the Convention, Bangladesh made the following declaration in relation to Article 14: ‘The Government of the People’s Republic of Bangladesh will apply article 14 para 1 in consonance with the existing laws and legislation in the country.’

29 The New Zealand Government sought to limit the scope of Article 14 by making a reservation granting sole discretion in awarding compensation to the Attorney-General: ‘The Government of New Zealand reserves the right to award compensation to torture victims referred to in article 14 of the Convention Against Torture only at the discretion of the Attorney-General of New Zealand.’

30 Similarly, the United States made a reservation to Article 14 to limit the scope of its obligations under Article 14. The United States consented to the provisions of Article 14 subject to the understanding that a State party is obligated to provide a private right of action for damages only ‘for those acts of torture committed in territory under the jurisdiction of that State Party’.²³

31 With regard to the declaration made by Bangladesh to Article 14, Finland, France, Spain, and Sweden all formally objected to it on separate occasions in 1999. The Governments alleged that the contents of the declaration made by Bangladesh constituted a reservation as it purported to modify the obligations of Bangladesh under Article 14. Further, it was considered by France, Spain, and Sweden that the declaration of Bangladesh was incompatible with the object and purpose of the Convention, as the provisions relating to the right of victims of acts of torture to obtain redress and compensation were essential factors in the fulfilment of commitments made under the Convention. These objections did not preclude the entry into force of the Convention between Bangladesh and Finland, France, Spain, or Sweden. Rather, the Convention remains operative between the States without Bangladesh benefiting from these reservations.

32 The Secretary-General received communications from Germany and the Netherlands in the same year also concerning the declaration of Bangladesh. Both States noted that the declaration more accurately constitutes a reservation of a general nature which sought to limit the responsibilities of Bangladesh under Article 14. Both Germany and the Netherlands alleged that such a reservation raised doubts as to the full commitment of Bangladesh to the object and purpose of the Convention. Consequently, Germany and the Netherlands also objected to the declaration made by Bangladesh.

33 Upon ratification of the Convention on 14 March 2016, the Republic of Fiji made a reservation declaring that it recognized Article 14 ‘only to the extent that the right to award compensation to victims of an act of torture shall be subject to the determination of a Court of law’.

Article 14 was in fact adopted with express reference to ‘the victim of an act of torture committed in any territory under its jurisdiction’’. The italicized wording appears to have been deleted by mistake. This interpretation is confirmed by the absence of discussion of the issue, since the creation of a ‘universal’ right to sue would have been as controversial as was the creation of ‘universal jurisdiction’, if not more so.

3. Issues of Interpretation

3.1 Scope of Application

3.1.1 The Conceptual Evolution of the Terms

34 The meaning of the terms redress, compensation, and rehabilitation has considerably evolved in international law and practice with regard to victims of gross human rights violations in general and victims of torture in particular since the drafting time of the Convention. While Article 11 of the 1975 Declaration²⁴ and the IAPL draft²⁵ used the terms ‘redress’ and ‘compensation’, the original Swedish draft used only ‘compensation’.²⁶ During the Working Group discussions, many delegations stressed that the right to compensation should be ‘as comprehensive as possible’. In the course of the discussions, the right to ‘fair and adequate’ compensation was added, and since ‘one-time monetary compensation might not suffice’, it was agreed to add the words ‘including the means for as full rehabilitation as possible’. The participants of the Working Group underlined that rehabilitation should be understood as to encompass various measures, including social and medical assistance.

35 In its practice up to 2005, the Committee followed the drafters’ intention to expand the right of torture victims to an adequate remedy and reparations beyond monetary forms of compensation both in its State reporting and individual complaints procedures. In one of the leading cases in this respect, Guridi v Spain, the victim had been tortured by three members of the Spanish Civil Guard in 1992. Although a Spanish criminal court had in 1997 found all three of them guilty and sentenced them to more than four years imprisonment and to pay compensation of 500,000 pesetas to the complainant, they were later pardoned by the Government and the King. The Committee found a violation not only of Articles 2 and 4, but also of Article 14 in spite of the fact that the Civil Guards had paid the compensation to the victim. It justified this holding by considering that ‘compensation should cover all the damages suffered by the victim, which includes, among other measures, restitution, compensation, and rehabilitation of the victim, as well as measures to guarantee the non-repetition of the violations, always bearing in mind the circumstances of each case’.²⁷

36 While not explicitly referenced in its deliberations in the Guridi case, the terminology used by the Committee broadly reflects the concepts developed in the UN Basic Principles, which were adopted on 16 December 2005 by the General Assembly after many years of drafting in the Sub-Commission and in the Commission.²⁸ The Basic Principles have since been recognized as the general conceptual and legal framework for interpreting the right of victims of torture to an effective remedy and reparations. They lay out a comprehensive concept of ‘reparation’, which includes the five forms of reparation, namely restitution, compensation, rehabilitation, satisfaction as well as guarantees of non-repetition.

37 In 2012, when formulating General Comment No. 3 on the implementation of Article 14, the Committee seized the opportunity to elaborate on its contemporary understanding of the terms used in the Convention. It considered that the term 'redress' within the scope of Article 14 encompasses the procedural concept of an 'effective remedy' and the substantive concept of 'reparations'.²⁹ The Committee further recognized that the five forms of 'reparation' outlined in the Basic Principles serve as framework for determining the measures required under Article 14 to provide full and effective redress.³⁰ In relation to the procedural aspect of the term 'redress', General Comment No 3 specifies that in order to guarantee an effective remedy, States parties are under the obligation to enact specific legislation and establish effective and accessible mechanisms capable of determining and awarding redress for victims of torture or other forms of ill-treatment.³¹

38 The specific legal obligations arising from the substantive and procedural elements of the right to redress are examined further below. At this point, it can be noted that Article 14 protects torture victims' right to a procedural and a substantive claim for redress. The protection awarded to victims by the Convention follows thus the standards of international law and practice regarding the right of victims of serious human rights violations to an effective remedy and adequate reparation. This alignment has to be welcomed as Article 14, even though it uses different terminology, constitutes a specific manifestation of the right to an effective remedy laid down in Article 2(3) of the Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (CCPR) and similar provisions in regional human rights treaties.³²

3.1.2 Personal Scope of Application

3.1.2.1 The Meaning of the Term 'victim'

39 The conceptual evolution of the terms used in Article 14 has also concerned the personal scope of application, namely the question of who is to be considered a 'victim'. With the adoption of General Comment No 3, the Committee has laid out a comprehensive definition of the term 'victim',³³ which is based on the definition contained in the Basic Principles.³⁴ According to the Committee, victims within the meaning of Article 14 are 'persons who have individually or collectively suffered harm, including physical or mental injury, emotional suffering, economic loss or substantial impairment of their fundamental rights, through acts or omissions that constitute violations of the Convention'.³⁵

40 An important aspect of this definition is the understanding that there are different types of harm or loss which can be inflicted through acts or omissions in violation of the Convention. As torture can leave both long-term physical injury and no physical traces at all, the recognition of the emotional and psychological dimension of suffering as part of the definition of victim is particularly relevant. Moreover, the inclusion of economic loss and substantial impairments to the exercise of fundamental rights as particular types of harm takes into account the multiple long-term effects of torture and other forms of ill-treatment not only on the mental and physical health of the victim, but also on their social and professional life, their participation in society, and their capacities to earn a living. The consideration of the different types of harm or loss suffered by victims therefore corresponds with the broad reparative approach encompassed by the term redress as outlined above.³⁶

41 The definition of the term ‘victim’ also recognizes that victims can suffer from different types of harm not only individually but also collectively. The notion of collective or group harm is particularly relevant in cases of serious or massive human rights violations that cause damages not only to the individual directly affected but to the community as a whole.³⁷ In such contexts, it is important to assess the harm suffered both on the individual and the collective level and ensure meaningful reparation that addresses the different dimensions of harm in an adequate way. In countries undergoing a transitional justice process, reparation policies and programmes are often designed to address collective dimensions of suffering and to reach out to large numbers of victims. While the Committee has recognized the added value of such reparation policies put in place by transitional justice mechanisms, it underlined that they cannot, however, replace the right of the individual victim to an effective judicial remedy, and to an individual assessment of the harm suffered in order to determine adequate reparation measures.³⁸ In the individual complaint procedure, the Committee has not yet had the occasion to consider the award of collective forms of reparations due to the fact that Article 22(1) CAT grants standing in the individual complaints procedure only to individuals but not to groups.³⁹

42 The right to an effective remedy and redress under Article 14 does not only apply to victims of acts in violation of the Convention which can be directly imputed to a State authority or a person acting in official capacity. In line with General Comment No 2, the Committee confirms in General Comment No 3 that the State also bears responsibility for providing access to full and effective redress to victims of acts committed by non-State actors, where the State failed to exercise due diligence to prevent and investigate such acts, and prosecute and punish such non-State actors.⁴⁰

³⁹ Regional Human Rights mechanisms, which provide standing in complaints procedures to individuals and groups of victims, have used the notion of collective reparations to different degrees in their jurisprudence, see eg Sudan Human Rights Organisation & Centre on Housing Rights and Evictions (COHRE) v Sudan Comm Nos 279/03 and 296/05 (ACmHPR, 27 May 2009), where the African Commission on Human and Peoples’ Rights (ACmHPR) requested Sudan to provide individual and collective reparation measures, including the rehabilitation of economic and social infrastructure, the creation of a National Reconciliation Forum as well as the equitable allocation of resources to address the long-term sources of conflict; see also Plan de Sánchez Massacre v Guatemala, Reparations, Series C No 116 (IACtHR, 19 November 2004), where the Inter-American Court of Human Rights (IACtHR) requested the Government of Guatemala to implement infrastructural measures to the benefit of the affected communities and establish a healthcare center with adequate personnel and conditions for the provision of medical and psychological care for victims.

3.1.2.2 The Recognition of 'indirect victims'

43 At the time of the drafting, the notion of victim was limited to those persons directly subject to a violation of the Convention. An important conceptual evolution introduced by the Committee in General Comment No 3 is the broadening of the term 'victim' to include 'affected immediate family members or dependants of the victim as well as persons who have suffered harm in intervening to assist victims or to prevent victimization'.⁴¹ The inclusion of both direct and indirect victims reflects the developments in international human rights jurisprudence and recognizes the effects that torture may have on family members and other third persons in a close relationship with the direct victim.⁴²

44 The damages on family members and third persons with a close relationship to the direct victim as a result of acts of torture can take on different forms. In addition to the often traumatizing effects torture leaves not only on the direct victim but on his or her next of kin, family members and dependants may also suffer material and non-material damages when the long-term consequences of torture on the victim affect the social and economic situation of the entire family. In addition, the reactions and attitudes of the authorities vis-à-vis the next of kin of victims of torture, such as threats, denial of access to justice or withholding of information on the whereabouts of the victim, can increase their anguish and distress. This is particularly the case when the authorities fail to carry out effective investigation or otherwise obstruct the efforts of family members to know the truth about the fate of their loved ones.

45 When considering the Committee's broad concept of the victim in the context of Article 14, the question is whether 'indirect victims' can bring reparation claims only ⁴¹ CAT/C/GC/3 (n 29) para 3. The Committee goes beyond the conditional formulation contained in the Basic Principles (Principle 8), which subjects the recognition of immediate family or dependants and other third persons as 'victim' to the conditions 'where appropriate' and 'in accordance with domestic law'. The Basic Principles therefore leave it up to States to consider in which situation an extension of the notion of 'victim' to other persons than the direct victim is envisaged and how the terms 'immediate family' and 'dependants' are defined.

on behalf of the direct victim, or also in their own right with a view to the different types of harm and suffering they have endured. In the early Punto Final cases against Argentina submitted by relatives of Argentinian citizens, who were tortured to death by the Argentinian military authorities in 1976, the Committee declared the complaints inadmissible ratione temporis. It observed, however, in a well known obiter dictum that Argentina was 'morally bound to provide a remedy to victims of torture and to their dependants'.⁴³ In later cases, the Committee accepted standing of close family members to bring complaints on behalf of the victim, such as an elder brother of a Tunisian activist, who allegedly died after being tortured in police detention,⁴⁴ or the family members and dependants of a Nigerian refugee, who had died while being held in a Canadian immigration holding centre.⁴⁵

46 In two later cases brought by the parents of the deceased victims, the complainants alleged violations of Article 14 both in relation to the direct victim and in relation to the denial of their own right to redress. In Ristic v Yugoslavia, the Committee accepted the communication of the father of the victim, found violations of Articles 12 and 13, but decided in relation to Article 14 that in the absence of proper criminal investigation, it was not possible to determine whether the rights to compensation of the alleged victim or his family had been violated.⁴⁶ In Nikolic v Serbia and Montenegro, the Committee accepted the communication of both parents of the victim, who had died in the course of an attempt of the police to arrest him. After having found violations of Articles 12 and 13, the Committee decided to postpone its consideration under Article 14 until receipt of the results of an impartial investigation of the circumstances of the death of the complainants' son.⁴⁷ In the Nikolic case, the complainants explicitly considered themselves as 'indirect victims' and referred in this respect to the ECtHR judgement in the disappearance case of Kurt v Turkey, where the Court had awarded compensation for the disappeared son's pain and suffering and the anguish and stress caused to the family of the victim.⁴⁸ Even though no violation was found in these two cases, the Committee did not in principle reject the compensation claims of the family members under Article 14 in relation to their own suffering.

47 Another question is whether family members can only raise claims to monetary compensation or also request other forms of reparation. This issue was explicitly addressed by the applicant in the case of Djamila Bendib v Algeria concerning the death of the complainant's son while being held in pre-trial detention by a branch of the Algerian army's secret service.⁴⁹ In this case, the mother of the deceased victim gave a detailed account of the inaction of the prosecution services in response to several requests for initiating a criminal investigation into the circumstances of her son's death, whose body had shown physical signs of severe torture. She had attempted in vain to receive copies of an autopsy and access the results of an internal investigation that had allegedly been carried out by the authorities. Due to the lack of responsiveness by the authorities, the family was without possibility to pursue criminal actions. In relation to Article 14, the complainant argued that by depriving the victim's family of the opportunity to bring legal action under criminal law, the State party had deprived them of the possibility to obtain compensation.⁵⁰ In addition, she argued that the obligation of the State to provide reparations was not limited to the provision of monetary compensation for the harm suffered, but that measures guaranteeing the non-repetition of the acts in question should be considered an integral part of the right to redress. Referring to the jurisprudence of the ECtHR and Human Rights Committee, the complainant asserted that the failure to prosecute and punish those responsible for the death of her son constituted a violation of the right of the next of kin of the victim under Article 14.⁵¹

48 In its consideration of the merits, the Committee found a violation of Article 14 and referred to States parties' obligations under the comprehensive reparative concept to guarantee full redress for all types of harm suffered by providing inter alia compensation, restitution, and measures to guarantee non-repetition.⁵² The Committee did not, however, explicitly distinguish in this respect whether the different types of reparation applied in relation to the victim or also to the complainant in her own right. Nevertheless, in the request for follow-up measures, the Committee not only urged the State party to initiate impartial investigation into the case and ensure that those responsible are brought to justice, but also to provide the family of the deceased with a copy of the autopsy and to ensure that the complainant receives comprehensive and effective reparation.⁵³ The Committee thus confirmed that other than monetary forms of reparation were in this case applicable to the mother of the deceased victim in her own right.

49 In the disappearance case of Colmenarez and Sanchez v Venezuela, the Committee accepted a complaint by the wife and the father of M Guerrero Larez, who had disappeared while serving a prison sentence in the Venezuelan General Penitentiary.⁵⁴ According to information received by the complainants through unofficial channels, the victim had been tortured, dismembered, and buried by other inmates. In addition to the issues raised by the complainants under Articles 2, 11, and 14, the Committee also considered the case in relation to Article 12 in light of the failure by the authorities to initiate prompt, effective, and impartial investigation almost six years after Mr. Guerrero Larez's disappearance. It also examined the complaint under Article 16 in relation to the treatment of the complainants by the authorities in their search to ascertain the whereabouts and fate of their husband and son and to obtain justice.⁵⁵ The Committee found a violation of

Article 14 due to the lack of a prompt and impartial investigation, but did not differentiate between the State's obligation to provide redress to the victim and to the complainants respectively.⁵⁶ However, it considered that the anguish and distress caused by the enforced disappearance of Mr. Guerrero Larez to the complainants, the indifference of the authorities to their efforts to ascertain his fate, and the refusal to release the bodily remains amounted to a violation of Article 16 of the Convention in relation to the complainants.⁵⁷ As follow-up measures, the Committee requested the State party, inter alia, to 'grant compensation and the means for rehabilitation in accordance with the Convention to Mr. Guerrero Larez, if he is still alive, and compensation to the complainants'.⁵⁸

50 While requesting that compensation be awarded to the complainants, the Committee did not mention other forms of reparation as it has done in the Djamila Bendib case.⁵⁹ A consistent development of the Committee's approach on the right to redress for indirect victims in line with the comprehensive reparative concept set out in General Comment No 3 should also encompass other measures in addition to monetary compensation. In particular, family members and other indirect victims should be granted redress in the form of measures to establish the truth, receive justice and satisfaction by means of a full criminal investigation capable of leading to the punishment of the perpetrators, as well as other measures aimed at the non-repetition of torture in the future. Family members and other indirect victims should also be provided with economic and social support schemes to address the impact the acts of torture had on the social environment of the victim.⁶⁰

3.1.2.3 Rights of Dependants in the Case of the Death of the Victim

51 The broad notion of 'victim' developed by the Committee in General Comment No 3 has to be distinguished from the second sentence of Article 14(1), which stipulates that in the case of death of the victim, 'dependants' are entitled to compensation. While Article 11 of the 1975 Declaration and the IAPL draft only addressed the right of victims of torture to redress, the original Swedish draft already contained the right to compensation of the relatives or other successors in the case of death of the victim. Various States supported this approach.⁶¹ The Austrian delegation proposed to limit the scope of the second sentence of Article 14(1) to compensation claims with respect to alimony in cases where the victim was legally obliged to pay such alimony. According to the delegation, all other forms or compensation in the event of the death of the victim should be open to his or her heirs as successors.⁶² The US delegation preferred to substitute ‘heirs, dependants, or successors’ for ‘relatives or other successors’, but the agreement on the single word ‘dependants’ is based on a UK proposal.⁶³ During the Working Group’s deliberations in 1980, some representatives felt that there was a need to extend the scope of this provision concerning persons who, in the event of the death of the victim as a result of an act of torture, shall be entitled to compensation.⁶⁴ One delegate proposed that the words ‘or any other person designated by law’ should be added after the word ‘dependants’. Rather than accepting this proposal, the Working Group agreed that a separate paragraph would be added to Article 14 containing a general savings clause.

⁵⁶ ibid, para 6.9.

52 The term ‘dependants’ in the second sentence of Article 14(1) indicates that third persons, in particular children and others who were economically dependent on the victim at the time of his or her death and who may or may not be his or her legal successor, should be entitled to compensation.⁶⁵ This entitlement is based on the notion of a specific economic loss as direct result of the violation committed against the victim (and thus narrower than the qualification of indirect victim as discussed above). Regional jurisprudence has established some criteria for dependants to receive reparation in the form of compensation, such as the regularity of the financial contribution made by the victim to the dependant, whether the nature of the relationship allowed for the presumption that the payments would have continued and whether the contributions had been based on a financial need of the recipient.⁶⁶

3.1.3 Interpretation of the Savings Clause in Article 14(2)

53 The savings clause was not included in Article 11 of the 1975 Declaration or in any of the drafts for Article 14. Its origin goes back to concerns of States in the Working Group relating to the second sentence of Article 14(1). In relation to the proposal of the Austrian delegation to limit the right of dependants to compensation to cases where the victim was legally obliged to pay alimony, the Swedish Government proposed in its revised draft a second paragraph reading as follows: ‘Nothing in this Article shall affect any other right to compensation which may exist under national law’. The Working Group agreed that paragraph 2 of Article 14 should be redrafted in the way it was adopted afterwards.

54 It seems clear from the travaux préparatoires that the savings clause was meant to ensure that the specific right of the dependants of a torture victim does not in any way affect other economic claims of the heirs and other legal successors against the victim at the time of his or her death.⁶⁷ For example, those children who economically depend on their father at the time of his death may have a claim of alimony under domestic law against the heir or legal successor of their father. The main purpose of the savings clause in Article 14(2) is to ensure that no compensation claim under domestic law in relation to the death of the victim shall be affected by a more narrow interpretation of the second sentence in Article 14(1). One example was provided during the discussions in the Working Group.⁶⁸ If a friend, neighbour, or, we might add, a Torture Rehabilitation Centre, has provided assistance to a torture victim, the fact that these persons or institutions do not fall under the term 'dependants' shall not, in any way, restrict their compensation claims against the perpetrator of torture or the respective State and its authorities. Another scope of application of the savings clause in Article 14(2) is the extraterritorial application of the right of torture victims to reparation which will be discussed below.

3.1.4 Applicability of Article 14 to Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

55 A key question of interpretation in relation to the scope of application of Article 14 is whether the right to a remedy and reparation in the framework of the Convention is limited to victims of torture or extends equally to victims of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment and punishment (CIDT or other forms of ill-treatment).⁶⁹ This issue has been discussed controversially since the drafting of the Convention. A literal interpretation of the wording of the first paragraph suggests that Article 14 applies to victims of torture and their dependants exclusively. However, the wording of Article 14 has to be interpreted in light of Article 16, which stipulates States parties' obligation to prevent forms of ill-treatment other than torture within the meaning of Article 1. The second sentence of Article 16(1) explicitly lists Articles 10 to 13 as provisions likewise applying to acts of CIDT not amounting to torture, but does not refer to Article 14. However, the words 'in particular' introducing this list indicate that the enumeration of Articles 10 to 13 may not be exhaustive. The wording of Article 16 therefore leaves both possibilities open.

56 Also the travaux préparatoires are not conclusive as to which interpretation was intended by the drafters. Some States, above all the United States, made clear that in their opinion Article 14 should only apply to victims of torture. Other delegations, above all Spain, Canada, and Ireland, proposed that a reference be made to Article 14 in the text of Article 16(1). In fact, the draft text of Article 16(1) for some time had included an explicit reference to Articles 3, 14, and 15 in square brackets. But in 1984, the Working Group decided to delete the explicit reference to these three provisions, and at the same time to include the words 'in particular'. In other words, the drafters wished to leave this controversial question open for the Committee to decide.

57 The first case in which the Committee had to decide on the matter, Dzemajl et al v Yugoslavia, concerned the 1995 pogrom against a Roma settlement by some 200 ethnic Montenegrins, with the police watching without interfering.⁷⁰ The Committee found a violation of Article 16(1) by acquiescence and, in the absence of any serious investigation, also violations of Articles 12 and 13. Concerning the alleged violation of Article 14, the Committee came to the conclusion that the scope of application of Article 14 was limited to torture and did not apply to victims of other forms of ill-treatment. In its line of argument, it noted the lack of an explicit reference to Article 14 amongst the Articles enumerated in the first paragraph of Article 16. The Committee considered, however, that the positive obligation contained in the general obligation of States parties to prevent other forms of ill-treatment not amounting to torture (Article 16(1)) included the obligation to grant redress to the victims of such acts. It was therefore of the view that the State party had violated its obligations under Article 16 by failing to enable the complainants to obtain an effective remedy and reparation.⁷¹

58 The Committee took a different view in General Comment No 2 of 2008, when it stated that the wording ‘in particular’ in Article 16 signals that this reference is not to be limited to those articles, but equally extends to other provisions of the Convention, including Article 14.⁷² Four years later, however, in General Comment No 3, the Committee does not restate this line of argument, but simply mentions the applicability of the right to a remedy and reparations to all victims of torture and acts of cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment or punishment without specifying how it had arrived at this conclusion.⁷³

59 This view is, however, not followed by the Committee in subsequent decisions in the individual complaints procedure as shown in the case of *Sergei Kirsanov v Russia*⁷⁴ of 2014. This case concerned a complaint on inhuman conditions of detention in a temporary confinement ward that amounted to a violation of Article 16.⁷⁵ Although the complainant in this case was granted compensation, the Committee noted that the award of a symbolic amount of monetary compensation by the civil court was insufficient as the civil court had no jurisdiction to impose any measures on the individuals responsible for the ill-treatment. According to the Committee, the State party had failed to observe its obligations under Article 16 of the Convention by failing to provide the complainant with redress and with fair and adequate compensation.⁷⁶ In this case, the Committee used its earlier line of argument (see the case of Dzemajl et al v Yugoslavia) by drawing on a violation of the positive obligation to prevent CIDT in the first sentence of Article 16, rather than following the reasoning set forth in the General Comments in favour of the applicability of Article 14 to other forms of ill-treatment below the threshold of torture.

60 Since the Convention as a whole is concerned with prevention, it is the purpose of the second sentence of Article 16(1), as lex specialis, to specify which of the other provisions also apply to CIDT. The reasoning of the Committee is, therefore, problematic as it turns this logic of Article 16 as lex specialis on its head. As the line of reasoning in General Comment No 2 shows, there are other arguments to arrive at the conclusion that the right to a remedy and reparation also applies to other forms of ill-treatment not amounting to torture. Starting from the text of Article 16, the words ‘in particular’ in the second sentence must be given their proper meaning. Looking again into the travaux préparatoires, it was clear that all the provisions relating to the criminal prosecution of the perpetrators of torture (Articles 4 to 9) would only apply to torture in the narrow sense of Article 1. Only the three provisions which were put in square brackets during the deliberations in the Working Group (Articles 3, 14, and 15) were considered controversial. Moreover, Article 14 can be considered as a special manifestation of Article 2(3) CCPR, which grants all victims of a violation of any of the rights contained in the Covenant, including the prohibition of torture and other forms of ill-treatment in Article 7 CCPR, a right to an effective domestic remedy. In light of the fundamental importance of Article 2(3) CCPR for the protection of human rights and its general application to all victims of human rights violations, it is more convincing to argue that victims of other forms of ill-treatment below the threshold of torture equally enjoy the right to a remedy and reparation under Article 14 of the Convention. The words ‘in particular’ in the second sentence of Article 16(1) should thus be interpreted so as to extending the applicability of other Articles than those explicitly enumerated to victims of CIDT, particularly where the protection thereby afforded is in accordance with established international law and practice.

61 It can therefore be concluded that the Committee, while consistently recognizing the right of victims of CIDT to a remedy and reparations, has used different lines of arguments to arrive at this conclusion. Inconsistencies remain between the Committee's approach adopted in the General Comments and the reasoning followed in the individual complaints procedure as to whether the right of victims of CIDT to a remedy and reparation is based on a positive obligation in Article 16(1) or on the expansion of the scope of application of Article 14 to other forms of ill-treatment. The State reporting procedure shows that in practice the Committee considers regularly whether States parties have fulfilled their obligations to provide full and effective redress under Article 14 both with regard to victims of torture and victims of other forms of ill-treatment.⁷⁷

3.2 Procedural Obligations

3.2.1 Recognition of Victim Status and Victim Participation in Proceedings

62 The prerequisite for the exercise of the right to a remedy and reparations enshrined in Article 14 is the official recognition of individuals having been subjected to torture as victims through domestic procedures. This is closely linked to the States parties' obligation to make acts of torture punishable as a criminal offence under national criminal law in accordance with the definition contained in Article 1 of the Convention and the obligations stipulated in Article 4. As the Committee notes in General Comment No 3:

The failure of States parties to enact legislation that clearly incorporates their obligations under the Convention and criminalizes torture and ill-treatment, and the resulting absences of torture and ill-treatment as criminal offences, obstructs the victim's capacity to access and enjoy his or her rights guaranteed under article 14.⁷⁸

63 According to the Committee, the recognition of victim status should not be made dependent on whether the perpetrator of the violation has been identified, apprehended, prosecuted, or convicted.⁷⁹ Rather, redress procedures must be initiated ex officio, when there are reasonable grounds to believe that torture or other forms of ill-treatment has taken place, even in the absence of a complaint.⁸⁰ The responsible authorities should ⁷⁸ CAT/C/GC/3 (n 29) para 19. In its concluding observations on the first periodic report of Djibouti, the Committee expressed concerns about the fact that it was difficult to provide any redress or fair compensation without a legal definition of torture; consequently, it requested the State party to strengthen its efforts to ensure redress for victims of torture and ill-treatment based on a clear definition of torture in line with Article 1 of the Convention, see CAT, 'Concluding Observations: Djibouti' (2011) UN Doc CAT/C/COG/1, para 18.

⁷⁹ CAT/C/GC/3 (n 29) para 3; see also CAT, 'Concluding Observations: Tajikistan' (2013) UN Doc CAT/C/TJK/CO/2, para 21, where the Committee requested the State party to 'provide all victims of torture or ill-treatment with redress, including fair and adequate compensation, and as full rehabilitation as possible regardless of whether perpetrators of such acts have been brought to justice'; see also CAT, 'Concluding Observations: Kenya' (2013) UN Doc CAT/C/KEN/CO/2, para 23.

therefore act on their own initiative (proprio motu) in order to identify potential victims where serious human rights violations are known to have occurred. For example, the Committee criticized the slowness of the proceedings and the limited results of investigations into political crimes known to have been committed during the communist era in Romania, which were not followed by the prompt identification of the victims and the provision of redress.⁸¹

64 In the State reporting procedure, the Committee has also emphasized the importance of the State affording official recognition to survivors of torture as victims. For example, in connection with the well-documented torture and other forms of ill-treatment that occurred during the 1992–95 conflict in the former Yugoslavia, the Committee expressed concerns regarding the State party's failure to recognize survivors of torture, including sexual violence, as victims of the conflict, 'a status which would enable them to obtain redress and exercise their right to fair and adequate compensation and rehabilitation'.⁸² In its later Concluding Observations on Bosnia, the Committee also underlined the importance of enacting national legislation, which clearly defines the status and rights of victims.⁸³ However, legal provisions which subject the entitlement of victims to redress to the recognition of the offence by the perpetrator are considered by the Committee as violating Article 14.⁸⁴

65 A fundamental aspect of the Committee's victim-centred approach to the right to remedy and reparation is the importance it attributes to victim participation in the redress process. As the Committee notes, 'the restoration of the dignity of the victim is the ultimate objective in the provision of redress'.⁸⁵ Therefore, procedural measures such as active involvement of victims in reparation proceedings should be designed so as to ensure that they contribute to restoring a sense of agency, autonomy, and respect in the victim. For example, active and meaningful participation of victims in the investigations and during the criminal proceedings can in itself constitute a form of rehabilitation and empowerment of victims and can contribute to a sense of justice.⁸⁶

66 In the State reporting procedure, the Committee has emphasized the importance of allowing victims to participate in criminal proceedings as civil parties.⁸⁷ Victims, their families, and legal representatives should also be given the possibility of challenging the results of investigations.⁸⁸ For example, in relation to the reports about high numbers of extra-judicial executions of opponents of the Government of Burundi and the corroborated evidence on the existence of mass graves following the Government's repression of the 2015 protests against President Pierre Nkurunziza's candidature for a third term of office, the Committee requested the State party to ensure that victims' families and their legal representatives were allowed to participate in proceedings as civil parties.⁸⁹ It also considered that the family members of victims should be given the possibility to request the presence of a physician of their choice during the forensic examination and the autopsy after the exhumation of mass graves and that they be given a reasonable possibility of recovering the body after the investigation.⁹⁰

67 The UN Declaration of Basic Principles of Justice for Victims of Crime and Abuse of Power affirms that judicial and administrative processes must be responsive to the needs of victims by, inter alia, informing victims of their role and the scope, timing, and progress of the proceedings and of the disposition of their cases, by allowing the views and concerns of victims to be presented and considered, and by providing assistance to victims throughout the legal process.⁹¹ The CAT Committee equally underlines that procedures for victim participation need to take into account the specific vulnerability of victims and avoid re-victimization and renewed exposure to trauma or stigmatization through adequate protection of privacy and the provision of legal assistance and psychosocial support at all stages of the redress process.⁹²

68 The Committee has put a particular emphasis on States parties' obligation to guarantee victim and witness protection against intimidation and retaliation due to their involvement in judicial proceedings.⁹³ For example, the Committee was concerned about the reported cases of intimidation against witnesses and of attempts at bribery by perpetrators in Bosnia and Herzegovina.⁹⁴ It requested the State party to ensure that witnesses and victims are effectively protected and to prevent perpetrators from exercising influence over protection mechanisms or otherwise pressuring or threatening victims to withdraw their testimony.⁹⁵ To this effect, it urged the Government of Bosnia and Herzegovina to ensure that the Department for Witness Protection of the State Investigation and Protection Agency respects the right to privacy of the survivors and provides witnesses

69 Meaningful participation of victims in the design and implementation of the redress process is also important with regard to the substantive aspects of the right to a remedy and reparation, namely to ensure that reparation awards are fair and adequate by responding to victims needs in relation to the harm suffered.⁹⁸

3.2.2 Investigation as Precondition for other Forms of Reparation?

70 One of the central questions of interpretation in relation to the procedural aspect of the right to a remedy and reparation is the relation of Article 14 to the obligations of States parties to undertake prompt, effective and impartial investigation into allegations of torture as required by Article 12 and to ensure that impartial and effective complaints mechanisms are established as required by Article 13. The Committee notes in this respect in General Comment No 3 that ‘full redress cannot be obtained if the obligations under Articles 12 and 13 are not guaranteed’.⁹⁹ This statement must be interpreted both from a substantive and a procedural point of view.

71 As will be discussed in more detail below, effective criminal proceedings resulting in the prosecution and punishment of perpetrators and setting a clear signal against impunity are in themselves an important substantive element of reparation as they provide satisfaction and a sense of justice to victims and their families.¹⁰⁰ Moreover, effective and impartial complaints mechanisms capable of carrying out prompt and thorough investigations are a prerequisite for ensuring victims’ right to know the truth. The full enjoyment of the substantive elements of the right to redress guaranteed under Article 14 therefore essentially hinges on States parties’ fulfilment of their obligations under Articles 12 and 13.

72 From a procedural point of view, experience shows that in practice, the availability, accessibility and effectiveness of reparation proceedings depend in the majority of cases de facto on the effectiveness of the preceding (criminal) investigations. In other words, without prompt, thorough and impartial investigations, the right of victims to obtain full and effective redress remains mostly ineffective. The Committee has established this link between Articles 12, 13 and 14 early on in the individual complaints procedure. But its approach on whether to proceed automatically to a finding of a violation of Article 14 in the absence of effective investigation has been dependent on the circumstances of the case.

73 In the two complaints Ristić v Yugoslavia and Nikolić v Serbia and Montenegro brought by family members of victims who had died during police arrest, the Committee noted that the facts surrounding the circumstances of the death of the victims were contested as witness testimonies, autopsy reports and forensic examinations yielded contradictory results.¹⁰¹ While it found violations of Articles 12 and 13, it concluded with respect to Article 14 that it was not possible to determine whether the right to redress of the alleged victims or their families had been violated in the absence of conclusive criminal investigations.¹⁰² Along the same lines, the Committee dismissed the claims of the applicants under Article 14 due to ‘insufficient elements to make a finding’ in several of the early cases against Tunisia despite the conclusion that Articles 12 and 13 had been infringed by the State party.¹⁰³ While it seems logical in light of the Committee’s subsidiary role to defer findings on Article 14 until the facts have been sufficiently clarified by domestic proceedings to determine whether or not the allegations were defamatory, this approach risks leaving the victims’ right to redress at the discretion of the authorities’ willingness to properly conduct investigations into torture allegations.

74 The risk of insurmountable obstacles to redress due to the inaction of the national authorities or failure to carry out prompt and effective investigations has been considered by the Committee in three early cases against Serbia and Montenegro. In these cases, the Committee consistently followed the argument of the complainants that the absence of criminal proceedings had deprived them of the possibility to file a civil law suit for compensation. Given the procedural impediments and the unreasonable delay in domestic proceedings faced by the applicants as a result of the inaction of the authorities, it found a violation of Article 14.¹⁰⁴

75 In the individual complaints decided since 2005 the Committee has generally adopted the approach that the failure of States parties to proceed to prompt, thorough and impartial investigations whenever reasonable grounds exist that an act of torture has been committed automatically also entails a violation of Article 14.¹⁰⁵ For example, in a number of recent cases against Burundi in which the allegations of the complainants were corroborated by clear material evidence, such as medical certificates detailing the physical injuries obtained as a result of torture, the Committee followed the applicants’ argument that the failure of the authorities to conduct an effective and impartial investigation violated Article 14.¹⁰⁶ Similarly, the Committee held in two cases against Algeria, that in light of the lack of prompt and impartial investigations ‘despite the complainant’s numerous claims that he was tortured, which were corroborated by a medical certificate and photographs taken on the day after his release’¹⁰⁷ or rather ‘despite marks showing on his face during his appearances in court’¹⁰⁸ the State party had also breached Article 14.¹⁰⁹ In some cases, the Committee also based its finding of a violation of Article 14 on the fact that in addition to the failure to carry out prompt and effective investigations, the State party had failed to provide any medical assistance and rehabilitation measures to the complainants, who continued to suffer from long-term physical and psychological consequences.¹¹⁰

76 From this case law, it can be concluded that where the complainant submits sufficient evidence to corroborate his or her allegation of torture, the finding of violations of Articles 12 and 13 usually leads the Committee to conclude that the complainant’s right to redress has also been breached. In the inversion of the argument, where the Committee is of the opinion that the complainant has not submitted sufficient information to substantiate his or her claim, the Committee does not find a violation of Article 14 even if it concludes that the State party has failed to fulfil its obligations under Articles 12 and 13.¹¹¹

77 In some States, victims are not only de facto, but also de jure barred from accessing civil proceedings pending the outcome of criminal prosecutions. The Committee has made it clear that in such cases any undue delays in criminal proceedings automatically constitute a violation of Article 14.¹¹² The reference cases in this respect concerned several complaints against Kazakhstan. The applicants in these cases were legally prevented from filing civil law suits for compensation since according to domestic Kazakh legislation, the right to compensation for victims of torture arose only after the conviction of those responsible by a criminal court.¹¹³ The Committee considered that ‘notwithstanding the evidentiary benefits to victims afforded by a criminal investigation, civil proceedings and victims’ claims for reparation should not be dependent on the conclusion of a criminal proceeding’ and that ‘compensation should not be delayed until establishment of criminal liability’.¹¹⁴ It concluded that the delay of those criminal proceedings amounted to a breach of Article 14.¹¹⁵ The Committee has also considered that other procedural obstacles to conclusive investigation processes, such as settlements or agreements during the investigation process, amnesties and immunities also pose impermissible obstacles to the victims' right to redress.¹¹⁶

78 As a consequence, the Committee has clarified that States parties must put in place the necessary legal and institutional framework to ensure that the right to a remedy and reparation is effectively guaranteed independently of criminal remedies.

3.2.3 Obligation to Set Up a Specific Legal and Institutional Framework for Redress

79 Article 14 contains the obligation to set up a legislative, institutional, and political framework for the right to redress of victims of torture. According to the Committee, States parties must put in place specific legislation, which ensures that victims of torture and other forms of ill-treatment have access to effective remedies and are guaranteed the right to gain adequate and appropriate redress.¹¹⁷ The legislation must provide the individual victim with an enforceable right to redress and must stipulate the procedural and institutional framework for its implementation.¹¹⁸ While the Committee accepts administrative reparation programmes and the award of collective reparations, they cannot replace but only complement the existence of judicial remedies rendering effective the individual right to a remedy and reparation.¹¹⁹ The legislative framework must also clearly reflect the acknowledgement by the State party that the reparative measures are provided or awarded in relation to violations of the Convention.¹²⁰

80 In the State reporting procedure, States parties are frequently criticized for their failure to implement the procedural obligations under Article 14, particularly with regard to the absence of a specific legislative framework guaranteeing an effective right to remedy and reparation to victims of violations of the Convention.¹²¹ In this respect, the Committee routinely notes that general provisions on the right to compensation for injuries in civil or criminal law are insufficient and emphasizes that Article 14 requires States parties to include in their national legislation an explicit provision on the right to redress for victims of torture and other forms of ill-treatment.¹²² For example, the Committee was concerned that provisions for compensation in Mongolia law did not specify torture and other forms of ill-treatment as a basis for compensation and requested the State party to review its legal framework accordingly.¹²³

81 The specific legislative framework required by Article 14 must be in accordance with the comprehensive reparative concept outlined in General Comment No 3 and include all forms of reparation foreseen therein. For example, while acknowledging the possibility of victims of torture to receive compensation under civil procedures and the Victims of Offences Bill in Kenya, the Committee regretted the absence of a comprehensive legal framework, giving effect to all elements of the right to redress, including compensation and medical rehabilitation.¹²⁴ Along similar lines, the Committee criticized in relation to Moldova that domestic legislation focusing on the right of victims to compensation fell short of the full range of reparation measures, as it did not cover psychosocial treatment and rehabilitation.¹²⁵

82 In addition to putting in place a comprehensive legislative framework, Article 14 requires the creation of independent redress mechanisms ‘competent to render enforceable final decisions through a procedure established by law’.¹²⁶ According to the Committee, such mechanisms should include judicial remedies, irrespective of other available remedies.¹²⁷ It also considered that disciplinary or administrative procedures alone without access to judicial review are not sufficient.¹²⁸

83 For redress mechanisms to be effective, information on the procedures to obtain redress should easily be available for all victims, including information on possibilities to obtain assistance and support before, during and after the redress process.¹²⁹ In relation to judicial remedies, the Committee considers that States parties should provide adequate legal aid to victims and ensure all other measures to enable victims’ full participation in the proceedings, including guaranteeing ready access to all types of evidence.¹³⁰ Strict adherence to the principle of non-discrimination and specific measures to facilitate access to redress mechanisms for vulnerable groups are required to render Article 14 effective for all victims of torture.¹³¹ In this respect, the Committee has noted that in many States parties, victims belonging to minority groups or groups made vulnerable by discrimination or marginalization face specific obstacles in obtaining redress.¹³² The design of redress procedures and mechanisms must therefore be sensitive to the specific needs of persons belonging to such groups in order to avoid exclusion, re-victimization, or stigmatization.¹³³ Residence in a State party must not be made a requirement for accessing redress mechanisms.¹³⁴

84 Redress mechanisms must also pay particular attention to gender-sensitive approaches and address the specific needs of child survivors of torture or other forms of ill-treatment. For example, procedural requirements and rules of evidence in relation to sexual or gender-based violence must be designed so as to afford equal weight to the testimony of women and girls, prevent the introduction of discriminatory evidence, and protect victims from re-victimization and stigmatization in order to encourage victims to testify and seek redress.¹³⁵ Judicial and non-judicial personnel should be specifically trained on gender-sensitive approaches and all personnel involved in the redress process should receive methodological training on how to prevent re-traumatization of victims.¹³⁶ In addition, positive measures should take into account the best interest of the child and ensure that the child's right to express his or her views freely is respected during the redress process.¹³⁷

85 In addition to the issues discussed above, the Committee has identified a number of further procedural obstacles in its State reporting procedure that impede the full implementation of States parties' obligations under Article 14.¹³⁸ For example, it recalled that in light of the 'continued nature of the effects of torture' and the fact that for many victims 'passage of time does not attenuate the harm', redress procedures should not be subject to statutes of limitations.¹³⁹ The right of victims to an effective remedy and reparation should be effective regardless of the time elapsed since the act or omission in question and regardless of whether it is attributable to a former regime.¹⁴⁰ Other procedural barriers to redress identified by the Committee concern evidential burdens, such as high standards for proofing and quantifying damages or harm, even when victims are diagnosed with post-traumatic stress disorder,¹⁴¹ as well as financial burdens, arbitrary refusals, and lengthy procedures or undue delays in awarding reparations.¹⁴²

86 States that have adopted specific domestic legislation on the right to remedy and reparation for victims of torture often fail to effectively implement those provisions and ensure that redress mechanisms are fully functional.¹⁴³ In some cases, where reparation awards have been granted by national, regional, or international courts, the Committee notes with concern the lacking execution of these awards and recommends the putting in place of coordinated mechanisms for the execution of reparation judgments across borders.¹⁴⁴ A frequently raised concern in the Committee's concluding observations is the lack of sufficient resources, particularly with regard to the provision of holistic rehabilitation programmes, including medical and psychological assistance.¹⁴⁵ In this respect, the Committee underlines that States parties cannot invoke a lack of means to implement the rights under Article 14¹⁴⁶ and that victims' right to redress cannot be made dependent on the availability or retrieval of assets of perpetrators.¹⁴⁷ To ensure that the financial resources for the provision of the full range of redress measures are actually available to victims, the Committee has recommended the establishment of a national fund for torture victims.¹⁴⁸

87 Finally, the Committee considers that States parties should put in place a comprehensive monitoring system 'to oversee, monitor, evaluate and report' on the functioning of domestic redress mechanisms and procedures and the availability of rehabilitation services to victims. In the context of the State reporting procedure, it has often regretted lacking, insufficient or partial information by States parties on the actual implementation of the full range of procedural and substantive obligations under Article 14.¹⁴⁹

In response, General Comment No 3 contains a detailed set of issues on which States parties are requested to provide statistical and other information, including, inter alia, information on existing or planned legislation and mechanisms to grant redress; legal aid and victim protection measures available; disaggregated data on complaints received, the number and type of reparation measures, including the amount of compensation granted and actually provided; the assistance measures and rehabilitation facilities available; as well as specific actions undertaken to ensure an effective right to redress for marginalized or vulnerable groups, including women and children.¹⁵⁰

3.2.4 Reparation Mechanisms in the Context of Transitional Justice Processes

88 A number of States parties to the Convention have put in place national reparation programmes or other administrative reparation mechanisms in the context of transitional justice processes to provide redress to large groups of victims of human rights violations in the aftermath of dictatorships or civil war. While generally welcoming such initiatives, the Committee has raised concerns regarding the limited temporal, geographical, and material scope of such reparation programmes and their potential reverse impact on the individual victim's right to a remedy and reparations in accordance with Article 14.

89 For example, the Committee was concerned that the Peruvian Central Register of Victims registering victims of the internal armed conflict from 1980 to 2000 could be closed prematurely, potentially leaving some 28,000 outstanding files of victims outside the Economic Reparation Programme and criticized that the programme did not include post-conflict victims of torture.¹⁵¹ Along similar lines, the Committee expressed concern about the initial temporal limitation of the Guatemalan National Reparations Programme and recommended the programme continue until all victims have received redress. Referring to reports that the mechanism prioritized financial compensation, Guatemala was also requested to ensure that all forms of reparation, whether individual or collective were fully implemented.¹⁵² In respect of the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia, on the other hand, the Committee found that the provision of moral and collective reparation was not sufficient and requested the State party to amend the Internal Rules of the Chambers in line with Article 14, in order to include, where appropriate, individual financial compensation.¹⁵³

90 Another concern in relation to reparation programmes in the context of transitional justice processes is that their focus on truth, reconciliation, and closure may potentially contribute to impunity if not accompanied by criminal investigations and prosecutions of perpetrators. While commending the contribution of the Moroccan Equity and Reconciliation Commission for determining the truth with regard to the human rights violations that occurred between 1956 and 1999 and its contribution to national reconciliation, the Committee remained concerned as to the limited geographical scope of the Commission's mandate, which left out human rights violations committed in Western Sahara. It also added that the Commission's work may have led to de facto impunity of perpetrators since none of them had been prosecuted until its last examination of the situation in 2011.¹⁵⁴ Similarly, in relation to the Truth and Dignity Commission in Tunisia, the Committee recommended that complaints of torture received by the Commission are forwarded to an independent investigation authority once its mandate lapses, that perpetrators are brought to justice and that the right of victims to seek judicial remedies for redress should remain effective irrespective of the reparations provided by the Commission.¹⁵⁵

3.2.5 Universal Civil Jurisdiction for Torture

91 Some provisions of the Convention explicitly apply only to torture which took place within the jurisdiction of the forum State (eg Articles 2(1), 5(1)(a), 11–13, 20(1)), which has been interpreted to imply that all other articles apply also extraterritorially.¹⁵⁶ One of the central questions of interpretation in relation to the obligations under Article 14 is whether it relates to redress for torture which took place within the jurisdiction of a forum State (the State where a case is heard) only, or whether it includes the right to redress also for victims of torture, which took place outside the forum State's territorial or personal jurisdiction.

92 The drafting history sheds little light on the question as to whether Article 14 allows for extraterritorial application. The original Swedish draft contained no express territorial limitation and there was no discussion on the issue in the 1980 Session of the Working Group. A proposal by the Netherlands to insert the words 'committed in any territory under its jurisdiction' after the word 'torture' in Article 14 was adopted by the Working Group in 1981 and remained in the draft during the 1982 meeting of the Group.¹⁵⁷ However, this phrase disappeared from the text and neither the travaux nor Burger and Danelius¹⁵⁸ provide any insight as to why it was deleted. On the one hand, it could be argued that the removal of the phrase, albeit undocumented, was intended to make clear that the revised version was not territorially limited.¹⁵⁹ On the other hand, it could be contended that the territorial limitation was so obvious that it did not need to be spelt out.

93 Prior to the adoption of the Basic Principles in April 2005, the Committee had remained silent when confronted with States' assertions that the provision of remedies and rehabilitation to victims of extraterritorial torture remained a matter within their discretion.¹⁶⁰ Where States parties provided special rehabilitation services to non-national torture victims, the Committee commended such measures but did not insist on any duty deriving from Article 14 of forum States to provide such services.¹⁶¹

¹⁵⁹ According to Byrnes, States parties were unlikely to agree lightly to make their legal systems, including legal aid, rehabilitation facilities, and compensation funds, available to all, and an explicit statement to that effect would be expected if such an obligation were to be imposed. Furthermore, he argues that the presence of the savings clause in Article 14(2) 'would seem to suggest that, at most, the drafters did not wish to preclude States from adopting a universal approach to redress such as that found in the United States' Torture Victim Protection Act (TVPA)'. Byrnes points to the analysis of the provision which accompanied President Reagan's submission of the CAT to the US Senate in 1988 as well as the US understanding entered to Article 14 (which had received no objection from other States at the time) as strong evidence of the view that this was merely a mistaken omission: see Andrew Byrnes, 'Civil Remedies for Torture Committed Abroad: An Obligation under the Convention?' in Craig Scott (ed), Torture as Tort: Comparative Perspectives on the Development of Transnational Human Rights Litigation (Hart 2001) 543.

94 With the passing of General Comment No 3 in 2012, the Committee clarified that Article 14 contains an obligation of forum States to ensure that all victims of torture and other forms of ill-treatment have access to a remedy and obtain redress, and that this right is not limited to victims who were harmed in the territory of the State party or by nationals of the State party.¹⁶² It noted that this was particularly important when a victim is unable to exercise the rights guaranteed under Article 14 in the territory where the violation took place.¹⁶³ The Committee also affirmed that redress should be made available to asylum seekers and refugees.¹⁶⁴

95 This progressive interpretation of Article 14 is, however, not yet consistently reflected in the Committee's practice in individual complaints procedures. The only communication decided by the Committee, in which the applicant claimed protection under Article 14 by means of universal civil jurisdiction, is the case of Z v Australia. The complainant, an Australian citizen, was arrested and tortured in detention in China due to her adherence to the Falun Gong movement. The complainant filed a complaint against Chinese officials at Australian courts. The Supreme Court of New South Wales ruled that it lacked jurisdiction over the respondents, and the New South Wales Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal on the grounds that under the Foreign States Immunities Act of 1985, foreign Government officials enjoyed immunity from civil liability for torture. In her complaint to the Committee, the applicant argued that the State party had violated Article 14 of the Convention by failing to provide her with an enforceable right to redress and compensation for torture perpetrated against her in China, and that the application of Article 14 was not limited to acts of torture committed within a State party's territory. She further argued that the immunity provided by the Foreign States Immunities Act of 1985 was inconsistent with the obligations of the forum State under the Convention.¹⁶⁵ While referring to General Comment No 3, the Committee concluded that: '... in the specific circumstances of this case, the State party is unable to establish jurisdiction over officials of another State for alleged acts committed outside the State party's territory'.¹⁶⁶ Hence, the Committee considered the complainant's claim to redress and compensation inadmissible. The Committee thus seems to accept States parties' discretion regarding the possibility to allow in its domestic legal framework for civil jurisdiction in relation to foreign State officials.

¹⁶⁴ But consider eg in this respect the jurisprudence of the ECtHR in the case Nait-Liman v Switzerland, where the Court did not support an evolving principle of universal civil jurisdiction but upheld the stance Switzerland had taken in national proceedings: Abdennacer Nait-Liman, who had been granted asylum in Switzerland on account of, inter alia, torture experienced in his home country Tunisia, and had been awarded Swiss citizenship, filed a civil suit for compensation from the former Minister of the Interior and the Tunisian State for the damage he suffered. A criminal complaint had failed when the Minister left Switzerland just before the complaint could be followed up with. The Swiss authorities rejected the civil claim because of a lacking link to Switzerland. The ECtHR did not find that Switzerland had thereby violated Art 6 ECHR and ruled that the Swiss courts were entitled to reject the claim due to a lack of established links with Switzerland, albeit with a narrow vote of 4:3. See Nait-Liman v Switzerland App no 51357/07 (ECtHR, 21 June 2016).

96 The Committee has followed the same approach in the State reporting procedure. Countries which have not incorporated into their legal system mechanisms that facilitate universal civil jurisdiction for torture have not been requested to do so, while some States whose legal framework comprises such mechanisms¹⁶⁷ have received recommendations as to the removal of obstacles to their effective usage. In its Concluding Observations on Canada, for example, the Committee recommended that the State party should consider amending the State Immunity Act to ensure access to redress for all victims of torture, wherever the acts of torture occurred and regardless of the nationality of the perpetrator or the victim.¹⁶⁸

97 The US entered a reservation stating that it understood Article 14 to remain subject to territorial limits,¹⁶⁹ despite the fact that the US Alien Tort Claims Act of 1789 allows civil suits under domestic legislation for acts committed outside of US jurisdiction. In the landmark case of Filártiga,¹⁷⁰ the Alien Tort Claims Act was used to allow an alien to sue another alien for damages in a US court for injuries caused by violations in international law (the torture and murder of a young Paraguayan who was respectively the son and brother of the plaintiffs). The case was followed by the passing of the US Torture Victims Protection Act (TVPA) in 1991.¹⁷¹ In the context of litigation against

¹⁷¹ A victim wishing to sue under tort law in the United States faces the difficulty that the defendant must be present on the territory under its jurisdiction. The personal jurisdiction requirement can, however, be fulfilled with 'tag jurisdiction', ie the defendant's temporary presence in the US, or, for corporations, minimum contacts. See Paul Barker, 'Universal Civil Jurisdiction and the Extraterritorial Reach of the Alien Tort Statute: The Case of Kiobel before the United States Supreme Court' (2012) 20 U Miami Int'l & Comp L Rev 1. There are many other legal hurdles, even once jurisdiction is established. Donovan and Roberts point to a study according to which about 80% of human rights cases brought under the Alien Tort Claims Act and Torture Victims Protection Act were (in the last two decades of the twentieth century) dismissed on grounds such as forum non conveniens, act of State, sovereign immunity, and other similar bases, see K Lee Boyd, 'Universal Jurisdiction and Structural Reasonableness' (2004) 40 Tex Int'l LJ 1, 2, n 6; cited in Donald Francis Donovan and Anthea Roberts, 'The Emerging Recognition of Universal Civil Jurisdiction' (2006) 100(1) AJIL 156.

corporations concomitant in the perpetration of grave human rights violations, the case Kiobel v Shell, however, evolved to be a setback for victims of torture seeking redress in US courts.¹⁷² The Supreme Court of the United States in 2013 handed down its ruling that the Alien Tort Statute does not apply to conduct outside of the United States.¹⁷³

98 Given that torture is equally heinous regardless of whether a civil or criminal remedy is in question, allowing universal criminal jurisdiction while denying universal civil jurisdiction is arguably rather illogical. Since forum States have the duty to investigate and prosecute perpetrators of torture of other countries in order to make them accountable for their crimes, it would seem unreasonable if they do not equally have a duty to ensure that the victims of these perpetrators, when present in their jurisdiction, can seek redress and reparation for the crimes committed.¹⁷⁴

99 Establishing jurisdiction in cases involving universal civil jurisdiction is just the first hurdle: a particular obstacle that may then arise is the problem of State immunity. One of the rare domestic cases in which universal civil jurisdiction was accepted in spite of State immunity is the Ferrini case.¹⁷⁵ In that case, an Italian national filed a civil action in Italy against Germany for violations of customary international law on deportation and forced labour during World War II. The Italian Supreme Court found that Germany did not enjoy sovereign immunity for international crimes which are the subject of a peremptory norm¹⁷⁶ and found Mr. Ferrini was entitled to reparations from Germany. Numerous other Italian victims of Nazi war crimes followed suit. In 2012, however, the ICJ ruled that the Ferrini judgment had violated Germany's sovereignty and that Germany had legal immunity from jurisdiction by foreign States.¹⁷⁷

100 Similar setbacks for the legal enforcement of reparation claims of victims are numerous. As we have seen in the case Z v Australia, the CAT Committee did not challenge the forum State's invocation of State immunity when dismissing the case.¹⁷⁸ In the of case Al-Adsani v United Kingdom, the complainant (who had dual citizenship of the UK and Kuwait and had been tortured in Kuwait by order of a Kuwaiti Sheikh in 1991) had sought compensation against the Sheikh and the State of Kuwait, but the British Court of Appeal had decided to grant immunity to Kuwait on the basis that the circumstances of the case did not constitute an exception to the immunity principle under the terms of the State Immunity Act 1978 (UK). The ECtHR, where Al-Adsani initiated proceedings in 1997, rejected the alleged violation of Article 3 ECHR due to a lack of causal connections between the act of torture and acts or omissions of the UK, and also did not find a violation of Article 6(1) ECHR (access to court). The Court argued that it did not find it established 'that there is yet acceptance in international law of the proposition that States are not entitled to immunity in respect of civil claims for damages for alleged torture committed outside the forum State'.¹⁷⁹

The Royal Dutch/Shell company was sued in US federal courts by, amongst others, Esther Kiobel, widow of a member of the Movement for the Survival of the Ogoni People (MOSOP). The lawsuit was brought under the Alien Tort Statute and alleged that Shell, through its Nigerian subsidiary Shell Petroleum Development Company of Nigeria (SPDC), had been complicit in the commission of, inter alia, widespread and systematic torture committed by the then military Government of Nigeria by providing transportation and company property to be used by the Nigerian military and by thereby supporting their raids against the MOSOP, who led a protest movement against the environmental damage caused by oil extraction in the Ogoni region of Nigeria. The petitioners had later moved to the United States and had been granted political asylum.

101 The question of immunity was also considered at some length by British courts in the case Jones v Saudi Arabia which was initiated by British nationals who had been imprisoned and subjected to torture in Saudi Arabia. Saudi Arabia denied the allegations and refused to open an investigation into the allegations of torture.¹⁸⁰ The case was adjudicated by the ECtHR in 2014 in Jones and other v United Kingdom with regard to the applicants' claim that their right of access to a court was unduly restricted by the judgment of the House of Lords upholding immunity of Saudi State officials. The ECtHR found no violation of Article 6(1) ECHR, arguing that the restriction of the right in the present case pursued a legitimate aim and observed the proportionality principle between means applied and objectives to be achieved.¹⁸¹ Investigating whether a development in international jurisprudence was discernible concerning the existence of a torture exception to the doctrine of State immunity since its earlier judgment in Al-Adsani, the ECtHR considered, inter alia, the judgment of the ICJ on the Jurisdictional Immunities of the State,¹⁸² which found that jus cogens norms such as the prohibition of torture do not overrule State immunity.¹⁸³ The ECtHR did not find the CAT to contain an obligation for States to exercise universal jurisdiction in civil cases¹⁸⁴ and, referring to, inter alia, Canadian, Australian, and US American case law, diagnosed a lack of international and national jurisprudence establishing a principle of universal civil jurisdiction for torture. It concluded that while there is in the Court's view some emerging support in favor of a special rule or exception in public international law in cases concerning civil claims for torture lodged against foreign State officials, the bulk of the authority is ... to the effect that the State's right to immunity may not be circumvented by suing its servants or agents instead ... State practice on the question is in a state of flux, with evidence of both the grant and the refusal of immunity ratione materiae in such cases ... International opinion on the question may be said to be beginning to evolve, as demonstrated recently by the discussions around the work of the ILC in the criminal sphere. This work is ongoing and further developments can be expected.¹⁸⁵

102 Hence, while universal civil jurisdiction for torture remains contested terrain, the Committee has in General Comment No 3 considered that Article 14 is not limited to territorial application and recommended that States parties ensure that all victims of torture and other forms of ill-treatment are able to access remedy and obtain redress. It is therefore desirable for States parties to adopt national legislation enabling civil universal jurisdiction. If States are serious in wanting to combat torture, State immunity should not be permitted to act as a shield.

103 The obligations of States parties enshrined in Article 14 relate to reparations for all victims of torture and other forms of ill-treatment. In particular, access to rehabilitation programmes should also be open to asylum seekers and refugees.¹⁸⁶

3.2.6 Reparations for Victims of the 'War on Terror'

104 In the context of access to redress by victims of torture of the US global 'War on Terror' and the CIA Rendition, Detention, and Interrogation Program, the Committee with reference to the Guantanamo detainees demanded that '[t]he State party should ensure that all victims of torture are able to access a remedy and obtain redress, wherever acts of torture have occurred, and regardless of the nationality of the perpetrator or the victim'.¹⁸⁷ And it added further:

While noting the State party's assertion that its legislation provides a wide range of civil remedies for seeking redress in cases of torture at the federal and state levels, the Committee regrets that the delegation only provided limited information about rehabilitation programmes for both domestic and third-country victims and the resources allocated to support such programmes.¹⁸⁸

105 In the course of the State reporting procedure in 2014, Jens Modvig, the Committee's Rapporteur on the US, inquired with the US delegation how many Guantanamo victims of torture had obtained an effective remedy. The US delegation in their responses to the Committee had declared that 'The United States had also recognized that a time of war [and thus the law of war as lex specialis] did not suspend the operation of the Convention against Torture which continued to apply'.¹⁸⁹ However, representatives of the US Government also argued before the Committee that in their view, 'it would be anomalous under the law of war to provide individuals detained as enemy belligerents with a judicially enforceable individual right to a claim for monetary compensation against the detaining power for alleged unlawful conduct'.¹⁹⁰ Being an enemy belligerent (which many Guantanamo detainees turned out not to be) does of course not preclude a victim of torture to receive redress and reparation for this illegal conduct since the prohibition of torture is absolute.

106 Litigation in US courts has not proven successful, even after the publication of the SSCI report in 2014,¹⁹¹ which acknowledged US responsibility for a global secret detention programme subjecting individuals to enforced disappearances, arbitrary detention, torture, and CIDT. However, other States who colluded in the US secret detention programme have provided remedies and reparations to torture victims following court cases, views by UN mechanisms, or national inquiries. In 2012, the ECtHR, for example, awarded compensation in Khaled El-Masri v Macedonia for the extraordinary rendition, arbitrary detention, and torture suffered,¹⁹² while the lawsuit El Masri v Tenet against the former CIA Director George Tenet was dismissed by US courts due to a cited national interest in preserving State secrets.¹⁹³

107 In the prominent case of Maher Arar (a Canadian citizen who was detained whilst passing through JF Kennedy airport in New York from where he was transferred to Syria where he was tortured in detention), the Canadian Government, after an official inquiry into its role in the rendition of Maher Arar (an inquiry in which the United States did not cooperate),¹⁹⁴ offered an apology to the victim and a settlement of the victim's claim of $10.5 million. A similar move by the United States has to date not taken place. Litigation failed as Arar v Ashcroft was dismissed on national security and foreign policy grounds. In June 2010, the Supreme Court denied review of the case.¹⁹⁵

108 The Committee demanded, with reference to torture committed overseas that the victims must be provided with effective remedies and redress, including fair and adequate compensation, and as full rehabilitation as possible, in accordance with the Committee's General Comment No 3.¹⁹⁶ It criticized the fact that the State secrecy provisions and immunities had a particular negative effect on detainees of Guantanamo and extraterritorial detention sites as 'the regime applied to these detainees prevents access to an effective remedy and reparations, and hinders investigations into human rights violations by other States ...'.¹⁹⁷

3.3 Substantive Obligations

3.3.1 Meaning of 'fair and adequate' Reparations

109 As has been mentioned above, the substantive scope of the right to redress comprises the five possible forms of reparation set out in the Basic Principles, which are restitution, compensation, rehabilitation, satisfaction, and guarantees of non-repetition. These together form the comprehensive reparative concept required under Article 14 to redress violations of the Convention.¹⁹⁸ While the Convention specifies that compensation must be 'fair and adequate', the Committee has further qualified this formulation by adding that reparation must also be effective, comprehensive, and proportionate to the gravity of the violation committed.¹⁹⁹

110 Adopting a victim-centred approach is crucial in applying these criteria. What victims perceive as adequate reparation is different in each case and depends, inter alia, on the particular suffering, the social and cultural context, and on the individual sense of justice. Usually, victims of torture are not primarily interested in monetary compensation but in other means of reparation which are better suited to restore their dignity and humanity. Often, a full and impartial investigation of the truth and the recognition of the facts, together with an apology by the responsible individuals and authorities, and full social and health-related rehabilitation seem to provide more satisfaction to the victim than monetary compensation. The Committee therefore reminds States parties that redress measures must be tailored to the particular needs of the victim and take into consideration the specificities and circumstances of their particular case.²⁰⁰

111 The design of specific reparation measures for individual victims must give due regard to the situation and needs of persons belonging to groups made vulnerable such as LGBTI persons,²⁰¹ victims of human trafficking,²⁰² or migrant workers²⁰³ amongst many others. For example, in determining the harm suffered by victims of torture or other forms of ill-treatment belonging to vulnerable groups, it is important to consider the potentially differential impact violations may have on these victims due to the higher risk of exposure to violence and discrimination as well as their specific social or identity related needs. The Committee also draws attention to the fact that procedures for quantifying damages can have a negative disparate effect on such victims due to the formal and informal obstacles they may face in accessing and keeping money.²⁰⁴ In relation to the specific social or identity related needs that vulnerable or marginalized groups may have, the Committee considers that 'culturally sensitive collective reparation measures shall be available for groups with shared identity, such as minority groups, indigenous groups, and others'.²⁰⁵

112 Adopting a gender-sensitive approach to the determination of harm and the design of reparations is important to capture the gender-specific impact of torture and other forms of ill-treatment, including the social, cultural, and economic consequences of stigmatization and multiple victimizations. For example, the harm suffered as a consequence of rape or other forms of sexual violence is usually compounded with negative social consequences for the victims, such as stigmatization and ostracism with subsequent loss of status, the possibility to marry, or loss of access to communal resources.²⁰⁶ The gender-sensitive formulation of reparation requires thus going beyond the assessment of physical and psychological harm and needs to take into account the specific social, economic, and cultural impact on the victims and their families. In addition, it has to be considered that different types of reparation may have a disparate effect on men and women, and that women may be disfavoured by certain forms of reparation in the context of discriminatory rules in relation to land ownership, inheritance, or property rights.

²⁰⁴ CAT/C/GC/3 (n 29) para 39. ²⁰⁵ ibid., para 32. ²⁰⁶ A/HRC/14/22 (n 98) para 45.

113 Reparation must not only be tailored to the specific needs of the victim but also specific to the act of the violation, which must be acknowledged as such by the State party concerned. The Committee considers that general improvements of the human rights situation, development measures, or humanitarian assistance cannot be evoked by States parties as substitutes for redress measures to victims of torture or ill-treatment as they do not entail an express recognition of State responsibility for the violations of the Convention.²⁰⁷ However, it has to be borne in mind that reparation is not a concept exclusively oriented towards remedying past violations. On the contrary, as the Committee notes, the concept of reparation carries an inherent preventive and deterrent effect in relation to the prevention of the recurrence of future violations.²⁰⁸ This forward-looking element of reparations is particularly important to address the root causes of violations in contexts of structural inequalities and violence. As the UN Special Rapporteur on Violence against Women has noted, individual violations often feed into ‘patterns of pre-existing and often cross-cutting structural subordination and systemic marginalization’.²⁰⁹ Such patterns have to be addressed by designing reparations in a way that they link the right to redress on the individual level with ‘structural transformation’.²¹⁰

3.3.2 Restitution

114 Restitution as a form of redress is aimed at restoring the victim to the original situation before the violation of the Convention was committed.²¹¹ Since torture usually leaves indelible traces on the victim, restitutio in integrum (restoration of an injured party to the situation which would have prevailed had no injury been sustained) will in most cases not be possible.²¹² The Committee acknowledges that ‘[i]n certain cases, the victim may consider that restitution is not possible due to the nature of the violation; however, the State shall provide the victim with full access to redress’.²¹³ In other words, where restitution is not deemed an acceptable form of reparation, other reparative measures must be provided. Depending on the circumstances, the re-establishment of the victim’s situation prior to the violation can, however, be addressed partially by restoring the victim’s living conditions. The Basic Principles lay down that restitutions includes inter alia ‘restoration of liberty, enjoyment of human rights, identity, family life and citizenship, return to one’s place of residence, restoration of employment and return of property’.²¹⁴

115 Restitution is particular problematic where it means returning the victim to a context where he or she is likely to suffer from re-victimization or where underlying patterns of discrimination prevent the victim from fully enjoying his or her rights. This is, for example, the case for victims of sexual and gender-based violence, for whom the restitution of identity, family life, and active participation in social and economic activities may require measures targeting the wider community and underlying cultural and structural patterns reinforcing stigmatization, ostracism, and exclusion.²¹⁵ The Committee has addressed this risk by recognizing that for restitution to be effective ‘efforts should be made to address any structural causes of the violation ...'.²¹⁶ The transformative element that restitution requires in such contexts in order to address pre-existing structural inequalities is closely linked to the reparative measures guaranteeing non-repetition, which are discussed below.

116 In order to restore the life of the victim as much as possible to the situation that would have prevailed without the violation, the Inter-American Court of Human Rights (IACtHR) introduced the concept of a 'life plan' to the deliberations on adequate reparations. In Cantoral Benavides v Peru, the IACtHR awarded an education scholarship to the torture victim in order to restore his 'life plan' and his opportunity to learn a profession of his choosing. The Court did not explicitly define this as restitution measure but listed it under 'other forms of reparation'.²¹⁷ In the case of Loayza Tamayo v Peru, the IACtHR explained that the concept of a life plan 'is akin to the concept of personal fulfilment, which in turn is based on the options that an individual may have for leading his life and achieving the goal that he sets for himself'.²¹⁸ It therefore declared the claim seeking reparation for the loss of options that the wrongful acts caused to the victim as admissible and argued that '[t]he reparation is thus closer to what it should be in order to satisfy the exigencies of justice: complete redress of the wrongful injury. In other words, it more closely approximates the ideal of restitutio in integrum'.²¹⁹

3.3.3 Compensation

117 Compensation is the most common form of reparation awarded to victims of human rights violations for financial claims in relation to the injuries incurred. While the original Swedish draft of the Convention only referred to the right to compensation, the Working Group discussed that one-time monetary payments were not sufficient to address the long-term physical and psychological consequences of torture and agreed to add the words 'including the means for as full rehabilitation as possible'. A literal interpretation of this formulation may suggest that Article 14 is exclusively concerned with monetary forms of reparation, including the (long-term) financial means to cover expenses for rehabilitation.

118 However, the Basic Principles situated compensation within the comprehensive reparative approach as one specific form of reparation relating to the economically assessable dimensions of (material and moral) damages, to be distinguished from other forms of reparation such as restitution, rehabilitation, satisfaction, and the guarantees of non-repetition.²²⁰ In the same year of the adoption of the Basic Principles, the Committee considered in the case of Guridi v Spain that States parties' obligations under Article 14 encompassed more than monetary compensation.²²¹ Although the complainant in this case had been awarded financial compensation, the Committee found a violation of Article 14 in light of the fact that the perpetrators had been pardoned following their conviction to several years' imprisonment. It justified this holding by considering that 'compensation should cover all the damages suffered by the victim, which includes, among other measures, restitution, compensation, and rehabilitation of the victim, as well as guarantees of non-repetition of the violations, always bearing in mind the circumstances of each case'.²²²

²²¹ Kepa Urra Guridi v Spain, No 212/2002 (n 27) para 6.8. ²²² ibid.

119 Whereas in the Guridi case compensation was still used as an umbrella term, the Committee in later cases more clearly differentiated between the term compensation and other forms of reparation. The standard formula adopted by the Committee in the individual complaints procedure now reads as follows:

The Committee recalls that article 14 not only recognizes the right to fair and adequate compensation but also requires States parties to ensure that the victim of an act of torture obtains redress . . . Such redress should cover all the harm suffered by the victim and encompass, among other measures, restitution, compensation and guarantees of non-repetition of the violations, taking into account the circumstances of the individual case.²²³

120 General Comment No 3 affirms that while compensation is a multilayered concept, which should cover any economically assessable damage resulting from torture or other forms of ill-treatment (pecuniary and non-pecuniary), the provision of monetary compensation alone is inadequate for a State party to comply with its obligations under Article 14.²²⁴ According to the Committee, compensation for pecuniary and non-pecuniary damages should cover, inter alia, economic loss in relation to medical expenses already incurred as well as those for future medical or rehabilitative services needed; the award of pecuniary and non-pecuniary damage resulting from physical and mental harm; compensation of the loss of earnings and lost opportunities in employment and education due to disabilities as a result of the violation; and reimbursement of the costs of legal or specialized assistance or other costs incurred while claiming redress.²²⁵ As indicated above, in order to render compensation awards adequate and effective, gender-specific aspects as well as particular obstacles faced by vulnerable and marginalized groups have to be taken into account.²²⁶

121 In the individual complaints procedure, the Committee has not specified the criteria for the quantification of amounts of monetary compensation it would consider 'fair and adequate', due to the fact that it does not itself proceed to an assessment of the harm suffered by applicants. However, in the case Sergei Kirsanov v Russia, the Committee criticized the amount awarded to the victim for moral damages (10,000 rubles) as merely symbolic.²²⁷ The Committee also addressed this question in the State reporting procedure.²²⁸ In relation to Peru's transitional justice process, for example, the Committee criticized insufficient amounts of compensation and slow disbursement of economic reparations paid under the Comprehensive Reparation Plan.²²⁹ In relation to the process in Chile in the context of the National Commission on Political Imprisonment and Torture, the Committee highlighted in particular that 'austere and symbolic' reparation is not the same as 'adequate and fair' reparation as set forth in Article 14.²³⁰

²²⁴ CAT/C/GC/3 (n 29) paras 9–10; in the State reporting procedure, the Committee has frequently criticized States parties' legal framework for failing to incorporate other than monetary compensation for victims of torture and ill-treatment, see eg CAT/C/RUS/CO/5 (n 124) para 20; CAT, 'Concluding Observations: Armenia' (2012) UN Doc CAT/C/ARM/CO/3, para 15.

122 International and regional human rights bodies have developed different approaches to the assessment of pecuniary and non-pecuniary damages. The UN Human Rights Committee and the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights (ACmHPR) normally do not specify amounts of damages to be awarded to victims.²³¹ The ECtHR and the IACtHR have in their jurisprudence defined concrete amounts to be awarded to victims. The ECtHR is fairly strict in awarding only the sums for material damages that can be accounted for.²³² The IACtHR, on the other hand, does not necessarily make its estimate of the incurred costs dependent on documentary proof, but can make awards based on the principle of equity (an evaluation of the different factors of the individual situation of the victim to make an estimate of what would be a just amount).²³³ Both courts have awarded compensation for loss of (past and future) earnings to direct and indirect victims, taking into account inter alia the victim's salary before the violation or alternatively the minimum wage in national law and the average life expectancy.²³⁴ In addition, the Courts also award pecuniary damages for past and future costs in relation to specialized and continuous medical treatment needed by the victims, including affected family members.²³⁵ The IACtHR's notion of harm to the victim's 'life plan'²³⁶ also serves to assess losses or diminution of a person's prospect of self-development as a result of serious human rights violations,²³⁷ which is used as a basis for assessing other than material damages such as lost educational opportunities²³⁸.

3.3.4 Rehabilitation

123 As has been seen above, the entitlement to 'as full rehabilitation as possible' had been added as an essential element to the text of Article 14 during the drafting stage to ensure that remedies for long-term physical and mental consequences of torture were an integral part of the right to redress. The Committee defines rehabilitation as 'the restoration of function or the acquisition of new skills required as a result of the changed circumstances of a victim in the aftermath of torture or ill-treatment'.²³⁹ It aims at restoring, as fully as possible, self-sufficiency, independence, physical, mental, social and vocational ability and full inclusion and participation in society of the individual concerned.²⁴⁰ The Committee also clarified that the qualification ‘as full as possible’ does not relate to the availability of resources of States parties, but reflects the acknowledgment that the ‘pervasive effect of torture’ may prevent victims from ever fully recovering their dignity, health, and self-sufficiency.²⁴¹

124 General Comment No 3 lays out the Committee’s understanding of a ‘long-term and integrated approach’ to rehabilitation, which should include the assessment and evaluation of the victims’ therapeutic and other needs in accordance with the Istanbul Protocol²⁴² and provide a wide range of interdisciplinary measures.²⁴³ These measures need to combine medical, physical, and psychological rehabilitation but also extend to social, community, or family-based assistance oriented towards reintegration, as well as vocational training and other measures suitable to restore victims’ full participation in society. The Committee puts particular emphasis on a holistic approach to rehabilitation, which strengthens the agency of victims throughout the rehabilitation process by ensuring their participation in the selection of service providers and focusing on positive factors such as the strength and resilience of the individual concerned.²⁴⁴ Given the risk of re-traumatization, States parties should ensure that rehabilitation services must put a ‘high priority’ on establishing trust and confidence and to this end establish confidential procedures where necessary.²⁴⁵

125 In the State reporting procedure, the Committee has reminded States parties that referring victims to regular health services is not in compliance with the requirements of Article 14.²⁴⁶ Instead, States parties must adopt specific legislation putting in place concrete mechanisms and programmes specialized on the particular needs of victims of torture and other forms of ill-treatment.²⁴⁷ Access to these specialized rehabilitation mechanisms and programmes must be readily available to all victims of torture or other forms of ill-treatment as soon as possible following an assessment of their individual needs by qualified medical personnel.²⁴⁸ The Committee thus insists that rehabilitation cannot be postponed or made dependent on the victim pursuing judicial or other remedies.²⁴⁹

126 In accordance with the principle of non-discrimination governing all forms of reparation, rehabilitation services must be non-discriminatory, gender-sensitive, and adapted to the victim’s culture, personality, history, background, and language requirements.²⁵⁰ Concerning violence and sexual abuse of girls in schools, for example, the Committee considered that Mozambique should provide access to health services specialized in family planning and the prevention and diagnosis of sexually transmitted diseases.²⁵¹ In relation to victims of torture and other forms of ill-treatment during the internal armed conflict from 1980 to 2000 in Peru, the Committee recommended ‘the provision of such specialized services in individual cases as may be necessary regardless of geographical location, the socio-economic situation of victims, gender, and real or perceived affiliation with current or former opposition groups . . .’.²⁵² States parties must ensure accessibility of services to all victims, including vulnerable groups such as asylum seekers and refugees.²⁵³

127 While States parties can guarantee full access to appropriate rehabilitation programmes for torture victims through either State-owned services or the funding of private facilities and non-governmental organizations,²⁵⁴ such services cannot be left to private actors and external funding only.²⁵⁵ The Committee routinely requests in the State reporting procedures not only information on the establishment of rehabilitation services, but also the allocation of sufficient resources for their effective functioning,²⁵⁶ and has in a few cases also given concrete recommendations as to the State funding of rehabilitation services of private providers.²⁵⁷

3.3.5 Satisfaction and the Right to Truth

128 The notion of satisfaction is based on the idea that victims can draw moral reparation and the restoration of a sense of justice from the acknowledgment of their suffering, the acceptance of responsibility by the State, the establishment of the truth (with regard to both the individual victim and his or her family and with regard to the general public), and the punishment of perpetrators. As has been discussed above in relation to the procedural obligations under Article 14, effective criminal investigations resulting in the prosecution and punishment of perpetrators can provide satisfaction and a sense of justice to victims and their families.²⁵⁸ Satisfaction as a form of reparation is therefore closely linked to States parties’ fulfilment of their obligations under Articles 12 and 13.²⁵⁹

129 In addition, General Comment No 3 proposes a number of measures as part of satisfaction to victims,²⁶⁰ including inter alia full and public disclosure of the truth with due regard to victim and witness protection, the search for the whereabouts of victims in the case of disappearances, for the identities of the children abducted, and for the bodies of those killed. In relation to family members of deceased victims, States parties should provide assistance in the recovery, identification, and reburial of victims’ bodies. The Committee also suggests symbolic measures, such as an official declaration or judicial decision restoring the dignity, the reputation, and the rights of the victim and of persons closely connected with the victim; public apologies, including acknowledgement of the facts and acceptance of responsibility, as well as commemorations and tributes to the victims.

In the case of Venezuela, the Committee reminded the State party of the pivotal role State structures should play in the provision of rehabilitation services and requested that medical, psychological, and social services for torture victims should be affiliated with the State party’s public health system: see CAT, ‘Concluding Observations: Venezuela’ (2014) UN Doc CAT/C/VEN/CO/3-4, para 21. In the case of Paraguay, the Committee had already in 1997 expressed concern that no rehabilitation programs existed in the country, and had to reiterate this concern in its Concluding Observations in 2011: see CAT/C/PRY/CO/4-6 (n 149) para 25.

130 The recognition by the Committee of the right to truth as part of the States parties' obligation to grant satisfaction to victims of torture and other forms of ill-treatment and their families constitutes a significant evolution as it complements the procedural obligation of States parties to investigate with an entitlement of victims and family members to the full disclosure of the facts. For example, in the Djamila Bendib case,²⁶¹ the mother of the deceased had attempted in vain to receive copies of an autopsy and access the results of an internal investigation that had allegedly been carried out by the authorities. In this case, the Committee requested the authorities 'to hand over to the complainant the victim's autopsy report and records of the preliminary investigation'.²⁶² Thus, the Committee frames the right to truth as essentially a procedural right in the context of the criminal procedure against the perpetrator, closely connected with the duty of the State to investigate.

131 The right of relatives of the disappeared to know the truth about what happened to their family member is firmly established in international and regional human rights jurisprudence and entails an important substantive element of reparation as the acknowledgment of the suffering endured by those close to the disappeared victim constitutes an essential precondition of healing.²⁶³ In the ECtHR case El Masri v the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia,²⁶⁴ Judges Tulkens, Spielmann, Sicilianos, and Keller declared in a joint concurring opinion that the Court should have acknowledged that in the absence of any effective remedies the applicant was denied the right to the truth, that is the right to an accurate account of his suffering and of the role of the perpetrators.²⁶⁵ The Judges further stated:

For those concerned—the victims' families and close friends—establishing the true facts and securing an acknowledgment of serious breaches of human rights and humanitarian law constitute forms of redress that are just as important as compensation, and sometimes even more so. Ultimately, the wall of silence and the cloak of secrecy prevent these people from making any sense of what they have experienced and are the greatest obstacles to their recovery.²⁶⁶

132 The right to truth encompasses more than disclosure of evidence of human rights violations to victims and their families. It also carries a collective dimension in relation to society as a whole: for facts and events of the past to become truth, they must be acknowledged as such by the community or society, and information about them must to that end be widely disseminated. For example, the Committee, when referring to Japan's dealing with WWII military sexual slavery, demanded that the State party must publicly acknowledge legal responsibility for the crimes of sexual slavery, stop the repeated denial of the facts by State authorities and public figures, investigate and punish the perpetrators, and educate the public as preventive measure.²⁶⁷ The Committee also recommended symbolic forms of satisfaction in relation to El Salvador, such as constructing a national monument bearing the names of all the victims, and to declare a national holiday in memory of the victims.²⁶⁸

In CIA detention, he was detained for four months and tortured.

3.3.6 Guarantees of Non-Repetition

133 Guarantees of non-repetition are the element of reparation which is the most concerned with a forward-looking preventive effect and to a lesser degree with remedying past violations.²⁶⁹ In addition to States parties' obligations under other articles of the Convention to fight impunity and prevent torture and other forms of ill-treatment, the right to guarantees of non-repetition addresses underlying structural causes of violations in order to achieve longer term reforms and systemic change in the society as a whole.

134 General Comment No 3 lists a number of structural reform measures.²⁷⁰ States parties should undertake to combat impunity and prevent the repetition of torture or other forms of ill-treatment, including issuing instructions to public officials on the provisions of the Convention and ensuring civilian oversight of military and security forces. Judicial reforms with a view to strengthening abidance by international standards regarding independence, due process, fairness, and impartiality are equally listed, as are protection measures for human rights defenders and legal, health, and other professionals who assist torture victims. Other preventive measures mentioned include establishing systems for regular and independent monitoring of all places of detention, training for law enforcement officials and the security forces on human rights law, training on the Istanbul Protocol for health and legal professionals and law enforcement officials, and promotion of the observance of international standards and codes of conduct by public servants.

135 While the Basic Principles allude to social conflicts as being the breeding ground for large-scale human rights violations and stipulate that guarantees of non-repetition should include mechanisms for preventing and monitoring social conflicts and their resolution,²⁷¹ the Committee points out that guarantees of non-repetition 'offer an important potential for the transformation of social relations that may be the underlying causes of violence'.²⁷² Closely linked to the notion of satisfaction, the long-term and systemic perspective of guarantees of non-repetition goes beyond the symbolic level of moral reparation to individual victims, families, or affected communities by addressing necessary legal, institutional, and social change to prevent future violations.

136 In the individual complaints procedure the Committee does usually not make detailed recommendations on the measures States parties must adopt to guarantee the non-repetition of violations of the Convention. In the case of Ramiro Ramírez Martínez v Mexico, however, it recommended specific legal reforms required to prevent torture and other forms of ill-treatment in the future.²⁷³ More detailed recommendations on guarantees of non-repetition can be found in the State reporting procedure. In relation to Mozambique, for example, the Committee demanded the funding of prevention and protection programmes to eliminate violence and sexual abuse in schools, and awareness-raising and mandatory in-service training programmes on the subject for teaching staff.²⁷⁴ Equally, in relation to gender-based violence, the Committee requested Sierra Leone to implement trainings for judges, prosecutors, police officers, forensic services, and healthcare providers on the strict application of the legislative framework with a gender-sensitive approach, and to extend awareness-raising campaigns on gender-based violence.²⁷⁵ The transformative potential of guarantees of non-repetition has been particularly discussed in relation to gender-sensitive reparation programmes in a post-conflict context where they are considered to offer important entry points for addressing long-term legacies of gender violence and structural inequalities.²⁷⁶

3.3.7 Adequate Care, Protection, and First Aid Measures Pending Proceedings

137 The provision of full redress is usually a lengthy process, involving various judicial, administrative, medical, and social service providers. States parties must, however, also put mechanisms in place, which ensure the immediate medical and psychosocial care for victims, independently from the obligation to provide rehabilitation services and other forms of reparation.²⁷⁷ With regard to victims of domestic violence, the Committee routinely urges States parties to ensure that victims should benefit from protection, including restraining orders, and have access to medical and legal services, including psychological counselling, and safe and adequately funded shelters.²⁷⁸ For example, it observed in relation to Senegal that in addition to the provision of effective protection and immediate redress for victims of excision, the State party should ensure that its relevant Government programmes and action plans to combat gender violence and promote human rights include provisions on access to shelter, medical, and psychological assistance, and reintegration programmes for victims.²⁷⁹ It also recommended to the Government of Mongolia to ensure that all women who are victims of violence have access to immediate means of redress and protection, including protecting orders, access to safe shelters, medical examination, and rehabilitation assistance.²⁸⁰ In relation to ²⁷³ The Committee requested the State party to ‘... repeal the provision of preventive custody (arraigo) from its legislation and ... bring the Code of Military Justice fully in line with the decisions of the Inter-American Court of Human Rights to ensure that ordinary courts have sole jurisdiction over cases involving human rights violations ...’: see Ramiro Ramírez Martínez et al v Mexico, No 500/2012 (n 105) para 19.

1. Introduction

1 Article 15 is an important provision supplementing the absolute prohibition of torture. The rationales behind the exclusionary rule are manifold.¹ First of all, this provision is to protect the right to a fair trial. This reason applies primarily to criminal proceedings which must comply with certain standards of fairness, including the right not to be compelled to testify against oneself and the principle of equality of arms.² Consequently, the use of any confessions or witness statements extracted by torture in criminal proceedings constitutes a serious violation of the right to a fair trial.³ However, the scope of Article 15 exceeds the rights of the accused in criminal proceedings and excludes any use of evidence obtained by torture in any proceedings, be they criminal, civil, or of administrative nature, judicial and non-judicial.⁴ Information extracted by torture is usually considered inherently unreliable evidence in any legal proceedings, as torture victims are ‘likely to say anything (true or not true) to end their sufferance’, as for example stated by the ECCC Supreme Court Chamber.⁵ The exclusionary rule equally aims at more generally protecting the principle of judicial integrity. Most importantly, Article 15 has a very important preventive effect as the inadmissibility of the evidence removes the incentive for law enforcement officials to use of torture, thereby contributing to the prevention of such practice.⁶ This additional preventive reason, thus, goes beyond judicial proceedings and has a deterrent effect on law enforcement personnel and their use of such heinous practice.⁷ The preventive nature of the exclusionary rule was also recalled by the UN General Assembly, which explicitly recognized that the ‘adequate corroboration of statements, including confessions, used as evidence in any proceedings constitutes one safeguard for the prevention of torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment’.⁸

2 Although the exclusionary rule seems to be firmly established in most legal cultures,⁹ the absolute prohibition of using evidence extracted by torture was recently put in question in the context of the so called ‘was against terror’, with States casting doubts on the applicability of the provision to torture evidence that had been extracted without the complicity of the national authorities¹⁰ or setting up a very high—almost unrealistic—threshold for the standard of proof.¹¹

3 Moreover, although the wording of Article 15 seems to be fairly straightforward and has not given rise to much discussion during the drafting history, a number of questions of interpretation have arisen, concerning namely the type of evidence to which the rule applies, the meaning of the words ‘any proceedings’, the burden of proof, the applicability of the rule to ill-treatment, as well as the exception contained in the last part of Article 15.

4 The Committee has often examined the exclusionary rule in its reporting, individual complaints, and inquiry procedures. In the individual complaint procedure it has thus far examined several individual complaints invoking Article 15. Though in its early decisions it had adopted a fairly restrictive approach and found only few violations, more recently its approach seems to have changed with the Committee finding breaches of Article 15 more often.¹² Nonetheless, despite clarifications on the applicability of the rule to extradition proceedings, the burden of proof, and what positive obligations arise from this provision, several questions of interpretation remain open. This has made some authors calling on the Committee to adopt a new general comment.¹³ The article below will address the above mentioned issues of interpretation and provide an overview of the Committee's practice.

2.2 Analysis of Working Group Discussions

10 In comments based on Article 13 of the original Swedish draft, Austria sought to substitute Article VII of the IAPL draft for Article 13 of the original Swedish draft, based on the reasoning that Article 13 could be interpreted in a manner which would prohibit the prosecution of a person accused of having inflicted torture. In the same manner, the United States proposed that the deterrent effect of the article prohibiting the use of evidence of statements obtained through torture be maximized by providing an exception (as in the IAPL draft) allowing such statements to be used against the alleged torturer.

11 Following on from this proposal, the United Kingdom suggested that the phrase ‘except against a person accused of obtaining such statement by torture’ be added at the end of Article 13 of the original Swedish draft.¹⁹

a confession is obviously only one of the many elements of conviction. It is a matter to be evaluated freely by the judge and it may fail to convince him (Article 288 of the Moroccan Code of Criminal Procedure.) Furthermore, a confession obtained lawfully merely supports scientific or material evidence or proof by witnesses. However, if a confession is obtained by torture, it should be rejected and will be without effect. Moreover, a police officer who uses torture during an interrogation will incur administrative and penal sanctions.

13 The 1980 Working Group had before it the revised Swedish draft text. One delegate drew the attention of the Working Group to Article 12 of the Declaration and stressed that there should be conformity between the meaning of the Declaration and Article 15 of the draft Convention. Nevertheless, the Working Group adopted Article 15 by consensus.

14 A reference to Article 15 was to be included in Article 16, but as various delegations could not reach agreement on the matter, the reference was dropped during the 1981 Working Group.²⁰

2.3 Declarations and Reservations

15 None of the States Parties to the CAT have made any reservations relevant for the interpretation of Article 15. Only Austria declared that it ‘regards article 15 as the legal basis for the inadmissibility provided for therein of the use of statements which are established to have been made as a result of torture’.²¹

3. Issues of Interpretation

3.1 Meaning of ‘any statements obtained as a result of torture’

3.1.1 Type of Statements

16 Article 15 refers to ‘any statements obtained as a result of torture’. The initial wording of the IAPL Draft was more precise in this regard and clearly specified that the provision should apply to ‘any oral or written statement or confession obtained by means of torture or any other evidence derived therefrom’. This phrasing was replaced with a more general ‘any statements’ in the 1978 Swedish Draft, then chosen by the Working Group as the main basis for its deliberations. No substantial discussion on this aspect of Article 15 is, however, reported in the summary records of the Working Group discussions.

17 The lack of any discussions on this point during the travaux préparatoires and the very broad phrasing of the provision seem to suggest that the wording ‘any statements’ was meant to be as comprehensive as possible including any type of statements, regardless of their legal classification (confessions or any other type of information), form (oral or written) or author (defendant, co-defendant, or third party). This is also confirmed by the practice of the Committee, which has applied the provision to different types of statements regardless of their oral or written form,²² as well as the fact they were given by co-defendants²³ or third parties.²⁴ Similar conclusions were drawn by the ECtHR.²⁵

3.1.2 Indirect Evidence

18 It is discussed whether, in addition to ‘statements’, Article 15 also applies to any other type of evidence derived therefrom and if it covers only the direct or primary results of torture or also the so-called ‘fruits of the poisonous tree’, ie derivative or secondary evidence to which the coerced statements have led to.²⁶

19 In the literature there seems to be no consensus on this issue.²⁷ The omission of an explicit reference to evidence derived from torture and the fact that the IAPL draft did indeed include a mention to ‘any other evidence derived therefrom’, which was however not reproduced in the subsequent drafts, seem to suggest that Article 15 does not apply to the fruits of the poisonous tree.²⁸ On the other hand, such an interpretation would undermine the preventive rationale of the provision. admissible would in fact represent a considerable incentive to use coercive methods of interrogation, as well as more generally put at risk the principles of fair trial and integrity of proceedings.

20 The Committee appears to support an extensive interpretation of Article 15. For example, in its Guidelines on initial reports the Committee explicitly requires States Parties to report on ‘whether derivative evidence is admissible, if applicable in the State party’s legal system’,²⁹ thus implicitly considering that Article 15 extends to indirect evidence. The issue had been also addressed in a 1998 Concluding observations to Germany, where the Committee recommended ‘that further legislative attention be paid to the strict enforcement of Article 15 of the Convention and that all evidence obtained directly or indirectly by torture be strictly prevented from reaching the cognizance of the deciding judges in all judicial proceedings’.³⁰ Similarly, in GK v Switzerland the Committee has taken into account evidence that had been found following a search conducted on the basis of the testimony extracted by torture (firearms and explosives),³¹ thus backing the view that the word ‘any statements’ includes also other evidence.³²

21 The same conclusion is reached by other international and regional human rights bodies. In its General Comment No 32, the HRC has clarified that Article 7 CCPR applies to ‘statements or confessions or, in principle, other evidence obtained in violation of this provision may be invoked as evidence in any proceedings covered by article 14’.³³ The ECtHR held that ‘incriminating evidence—whether in the form of a confession or real evidence—obtained as a result of acts of violence or brutality or other forms of treatment which can be characterized as torture—should never be relied on as proof of the victim’s guilt, irrespective of its probative value’, thereby acknowledging the relevance of evidence other than statements.³⁴

22 But even if one concluded that the rule applied also to derivative evidence, other questions of interpretation would arise, above all, if Article 15 imposes a blanket exclusion to all derivative evidence. Though the Committee has never pronounced itself on this issue, it shall be noted that in some legal traditions, the fruits of the poisonous tree doctrine applies with some limitations, and evidence that is discovered through an independent source by the police or which discovery was inevitable may be considered admissible in proceedings.³⁵ However, considering the particular seriousness of the violation and the absolute nature of the prohibition of torture, the ECtHR has taken a different approach when it comes to torture tainted evidence. For example, in contrast to evidence obtained in violation of other Convention’s provisions, the ECtHR, attaching particular considerations to the use in criminal proceedings of evidence obtained in violation of Article 3 ECHR, has concluded that evidence obtained as a result of torture—whether in the form of statements or real evidence—would always and automatically render unfair the whole criminal proceedings, regardless of the probative value of the evidence and irrespective of whether they had a decisive impact on the final conviction. For the ECtHR, [a]ny other conclusion would only serve to legitimate indirectly the sort of morally reprehensible conduct which the authors of Article 3 of the Convention sought to proscribe or, as it was so well put in the United States Supreme Court’s judgment in the Rochin case (see paragraph 50 above), to ‘afford brutality the cloak of law’.³⁶

23 A more restrictive stance is taken by the ECtHR only for what concerns real evidence obtained as a result of inhuman and degrading treatment, for which it has decided to leave open the question as to whether such evidence would render the trial automatically unfair, and decided to apply the standard test assessing the circumstances of the individual case instead.³⁷ This point has been further clarified by the ECtHR in Gäfgen, where the Court stated that ‘the application of the fruit of the poisonous tree doctrine should be limited only to real evidence that has a causal link with the inhuman and degrading acts’.³⁸

24 In light of the foregoing, it is preferable to interpret Article 15 as applying also to indirect evidence, especially in light of the preventive rationale of such provision. As put by the ECtHR, any other conclusion would only serve to legitimate indirectly the conduct which Article 15 CAT aims to prohibit, and represent an incentive for law enforcement personnel to use coercive methods and thus undermine its preventive scope.

3.1.3 Statements made Before or After Torture

25 Courts have been similarly asked to determine whether the concept of ‘any statement obtained as a result of torture’ covers statements surrounding the interrogation, ie statements made before or after torture. The legal question arising in such situations concerns the temporal scope of application of the exclusionary rule.³⁹

26 The issue has so far never been addressed by the Committee, but it has been raised before national courts. For example, the German Federal Court of Justice which held that nothing in the wording of Article 15 CAT or in the States practice justifies an interpretation as extensive as to requiring a blank exclusion of the statements for the mere reason that they have been obtained before or after the infliction of torture. On the hand, statements made before or subsequently to the infliction of torture will have to be excluded if the torture already had or continued to have an impact on the individual at the time he/she made the incriminating statements.⁴⁰ In conclusion, the formulation ‘as a result of torture’ should not be limited to the moment when torture was inflicted but extends also to statements preceding and made subsequently to the infliction of torture if the coercion has indeed affected those statements.

3.1.4 Exculpatory Evidence

27 The broad wording of Article 15 suggests that the provision covers all type of evidence, be they incriminating or exculpatory. Again, the Committee against Torture has not yet had the chance to pronounce itself on this issue. But the question as to whether Article 15 extends also to exculpatory evidence has recently emerged in a number of national and international cases and is discussed in literature. In particular, courts have been asked whether Article 15 also covers torture tainted evidence when used for defence purpose by the accused person; and whether the provision can be balanced against the right to a fair trial.

28 The issue was raised before the ECCC Trial Chamber in the case Khieu and Nuon.⁴¹ There, the ECCC concluded that Article 15 bans also torture tainted evidence which it is asserted to be exculpatory arguing that '[t]he Accused should be permitted to adduce evidence that he asserts is exculpatory, but not at the expense of the integrity of the proceedings'.⁴² In Khieu and Nuon the tainted exculpatory evidence was invoked by the alleged torturers themselves, the Khmer Rouge leaders. In such a situation, the decision taken by the ECCC Trial Chamber is to be supported, as the right to a fair trial is only one of the rationales beyond the exclusionary rule, which instead equally aims to guarantee the integrity of the judicial proceedings and to prevent torture.

29 Yet Ernst maintains that torture tainted exculpatory evidence may be exceptionally admitted, when the torture victim and the accused are the same person.⁴³ In that specific case, it is argued, admitting exculpatory evidence would have a 'restitutionary effect' which is in line with the right to a fair trial and the individual rights of the accused. With regard to the preventive aim and the principle of the integrity of proceedings—which at first sight seem to justify an absolute ban of tainted evidence—it is further argued that admitting tainted exculpatory evidence would not undermine but rather strengthen the preventive function of the provision. The fact that the only possible way in which tainted evidence can be used is in favour of the accused/torture victim would render tainted evidence useless in the eyes of law enforcement personnel.⁴⁴ In this sense, a German Court held that it would be difficult to conceive that in order to preserve his/her own dignity, the accused is not allowed to invoke illegally obtained evidence that may exculpate him.⁴⁵

3.1.5 Foreign Evidence

30 The Convention does not explicitly mention whether Article 15 applies to foreign torture evidence, ie evidence obtained as a result of the acts of officials of a foreign State and without the complicity of the first State party's officials. Its broad wording, however, suggests that the provision should apply regardless of where the tainted evidence was

Alt. StGB oder eines Affekts). Dem Angeklagten 'zum Schutze seiner Menschenwürde' zu verbieten, diese Information zum Inbegriff der Hauptverhandlung (§ 261 StPO) zu machen und damit jeder richterlichen Würdigung—auch bei der Anwendung des Zweifelsatzes—zu entziehen, erscheint schwerlich vorstellbar.' obtained and by whom. Moreover, in practice, admitting foreign torture evidence would equally frustrate the rationales on which the rule is based. Torture evidence is in fact unreliable, unfair, and in violation of the principle of integrity of the procedure regardless of who has inflicted it or is complicit in its perpetration; and not applying Article 15 to foreign evidence would jeopardize its preventive function.

31 This view is supported by the practice of the Committee, which clarified that Article 15 ‘prohibits the use of evidence gained by torture wherever and by whomever obtained’.⁴⁶ Specifically, the Committee expressed concern about the interpretation of the exclusionary rule put forward by the Appeal Court of England and Wales in A and Others, which had decided not to apply the exclusionary rule to foreign evidence unless UK officials were found complicit.⁴⁷

32 The SRT is of the same view stating that the provision ‘applies no matter where in the world the torture was perpetrated and even if the State seeking to rely on the information had no previous involvement in or connection to the acts of torture’.⁴⁸

33 Moreover, despite some initial resistance, today also domestic courts seem to accept that Article 15 equally applies to foreign evidence.⁴⁹ In the landmark case A & Others v SSHD, the Law Lords unanimously found that the rule cannot be understood ‘to apply only where the state in whose jurisdiction the proceedings are held has inflicted or been complicit in the torture’.⁵⁰ The Lords agreed that the exclusionary rule shall apply to any proceedings within the UK regardless of the fact that the evidence had been obtained by torture inflicted by foreign officials without the involvement of the British authorities. In doing so, the unreliability of torture, the integrity of the proceedings, and the honour of English law were invoked.⁵¹ It was also argued that if national courts, exercising universal jurisdiction, could try a foreign torturer for acts of torture committed abroad they should a fortiori also be able to receive evidence obtained by such torture.⁵² A similar conclusion had been reached by the German Higher Regional Court of Hamburg in the Mounir El-Motassadeq case.⁵³ Though the main legal question in this decision concerned the probative value of the information provided by the US authorities—summaries of the statements made by three terrorist suspects during interrogation carried out by US authorities at unknown locations—the Court also acknowledged that Article 15 applies not only to torture conducted by German state organs, but also to torture conducted abroad by organs of another State.⁵⁴

3.1.6 Closed Evidence

34 As reported by the SRT, in recent years there was an increasing trend in the use of secret evidence and closed material procedures. This significantly increases the risk that evidence obtained by torture or other ill-treatment is admitted. The Committee had the opportunity to pronounce itself on the issue in its 2013 Concluding observations to the UK. On this occasion, it recommended that the State should '[e]nsure that intelligence and other sensitive material be subject to possible disclosure if a court determines that it contains evidence of human rights violations such as torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment'.⁵⁵

3.2 Meaning of 'any proceedings'

35 Another key issue of interpretation concerns the type of proceedings the exclusionary rule applies to and, more in general, what is to be considered as a 'proceeding' under this Article. The IAPL draft explicitly referred to 'any judicial or administrative proceedings'.⁵⁶ Although this explanation was deleted in the final version of Article 15, nothing in the travaux préparatoires suggests that the scope of application of Article 15 was meant to be reduced only to certain types of proceedings.

36 The Committee has consistently confirmed this broad scope of application and in light of its practice there is no doubt that the provision applies to any proceedings regardless of whether they are of criminal, civil or administrative nature. This is supported by the fact that the Committee has explicitly acknowledged the application of the exclusionary rule in extradition proceedings. So far the Committee has decided on four such cases, and found a violation in one of them (Ktiti v Morocco).⁵⁷ In doing so, the Committee observed that the broad scope of the prohibition in article 15, proscribing the invocation of any statement which is established to have been made as a result of torture as evidence 'in any proceedings', is a function of the absolute nature of the prohibition of torture and implies, consequently, an obligation for each State party to ascertain whether or not statements admitted as evidence in any proceedings for which it has jurisdiction, including extradition proceedings, have been made as a result of torture.⁵⁸

More recently, the Committee has acknowledged the application of Article 15 before military courts,⁵⁹ or proceedings in the framework of anti-terrorism legislation.⁶⁰ In certain cases the Committee also seemingly considered that Article 15 applies in any stage of the proceedings,⁶¹ including the review stage,⁶² and that the torture tainted evidence

'should never be permitted to reach the cognizance of the judges deciding the case, in any legal procedure'.⁶³

37 Yet, still today there is no uniform understanding of the word 'proceeding', and if this should be restricted only to court proceedings,⁶⁴ encompass any formal proceeding in which an administrative agency takes a decision, or even proceedings in the context of which the executive agencies adopt measure for operational purposes. In this regard, the practice of the Committee is not conclusive, as it has referred to proceedings as 'judicial proceeding' or 'court proceeding' but also to broader terms such as 'legal proceedings'⁶⁵ or 'any proceeding whatsoever'.⁶⁶

38 One of the arguments against the extension of Article 15 to proceedings other than court ones is that to do so would not be compatible with the wording contained in the Russian version.⁶⁷ Whilst the English, French, and the Spanish versions include a wording broad enough to encompass both concepts ('any proceedings', 'une procédure'; 'ningùn procedimiento') the Russian one explicitly refers to court proceedings.⁶⁸ Being all equally authentic texts as provided by Article 33 CAT, Thienel has concluded that Article 15 refers only to court proceedings, as only such an interpretation can best reconcile all language versions of the treaty in line with Article 33(4) VCLT.⁶⁹ Yet, on the other side, considering that all other language versions are consistent among each other's and refer generally to proceedings, one should not exclude that the different wording of the Russian text may be attributed to inaccurate translation rather than a specific will of the drafters to restrict the scope of application of the provision to court proceedings. In addition, it could be argued that Article 33(4) VCLT's rule on 'the meaning that best reconciles the texts, having regard to the object and purpose of the treaty' applies only when the 'comparison of the authentic texts discloses a difference of meaning which the application of articles 31 and 32 does not remove'. This means after that the interpreter has unsuccessfully applied the general principles set out in Article 31 and 32 VCLT, on which basis it is required to interpret the contested provision in light of the object and purpose of the treaty.⁷⁰ Considering that the object and purpose of the Convention is to 'make more effective the struggle against torture and other forms of ill-treatment throughout the world',⁷¹ and one of the rationales of Article 15 is to prevent torture, one could conclude that this provision should be interpreted more broadly.

39 In light of the above, another approach could be that the essential element defining the scope of application of Article 15 should rather be found in the formality of the proceedings, and the phrase 'evidence in any proceedings' should only refer to the assessment of evidence before a judicial or administrative authority acting in accordance with certain rules of taking evidence laid down in the respective (criminal, civil, or administrative) procedural code. This approach could also explain why the IAPL referred to 'any judicial or administrative proceedings' explicitly making a reference to 'administrative proceedings' in opposition to judicial proceedings.⁷² This would include, for example, proceedings before military commissions,⁷³ immigration boards,⁷⁴ Ombudspersons,⁷⁵ as well as any formal procedure which leads to a decision of a court or an administrative authority/agency.⁷⁶

40 There remains, however, the question as to whether the use of torture tainted evidence by executive agencies for operational purposes falls within the concept of 'formal procedure' and is thus equally prohibited by Article 15. Such a question has become increasingly relevant, especially in the context of the debate on the legitimacy of the use of torture or its tainted fruits for purposes of combating terrorism and in view of the increasingly central role played by intelligence agencies in this area.⁷⁷ A further layer of complexity is added by the growing cooperation among intelligence agencies around the world and the fact that certain States have shown a willingness to rely on foreign intelligence obtained through torture.⁷⁸ For instance, the UK Foreign and Commonwealth Office stated

we cannot get all the intelligence we need from our own sources, because the terrorist groups we face are scattered around the world, and our resources are finite. So we must work with intelligence and security agencies overseas. Some of them share our standards and laws while others do not. But we cannot afford the luxury of only dealing with those that do. The intelligence we get from others saves British lives.⁷⁹

Similarly the German Government argued that the use of foreign intelligence for operational purposes, such as for example to prevent a terrorist attack, is not prohibited by international law, and that the cooperation between various intelligence agencies in the global fight against terror would make it impossible to ascertain whether some of the information obtained may be the result of torture.⁸⁰ In Germany, an intensive debate arose about the legitimacy of using information received by foreign intelligence agencies likely to use torture for the mere purpose of preventing terrorist acts.⁸¹

41 Though the Committee has not pronounced itself explicitly on this issue, it has referred to the use of intelligence for operational purposes several times. In its Concluding observation to Germany the Committee stated that '[t]he absence of information on whether the Government continues to rely on information from intelligence services of other countries, some of which may have been extracted through torture or ill-treatment, is of serious concern ...', and recommended to '[r]efrain from "automatic reliance" on the information from intelligence services of other countries, with the aim of preventing torture or ill-treatment in the context of forced confessions'.⁸² Most recently, commenting on the practice of some States parties to adopt national guidelines for intelligence offices and service personnel,⁸³ the Committee has welcomed the publication of such guidance 'as an important step toward ensuring transparency and accountability in relation to the actions of its personnel operating overseas and their relationships with foreign intelligence services';⁸⁴ but criticized them in so far as they allow for the possibility of seeking assurances in situations where actions of foreign security and intelligence services pose a serious risk of torture or other ill-treatment⁸⁵ as well as relying upon information from foreign entities that is likely derived through ill-treatment in exceptional circumstances involving threats to public safety.

42 The question has also been addressed, at least to some extent, in the House of Lords' judgment A and Others, where the Law Lords had to rule on the applicability of the exclusionary rule to proceedings before the UK Special Immigration Appeals Commission (SIAC), as well as before the Secretary of State, and more in general by the 'executive arm of the state', such as secret services, the police, or other executive agencies.⁸⁶ While the Law Lords considered the SIAC as a judicial body and thus deemed the exclusionary rule applicable before it, they rejected that the rule could apply to the executive, thus considering it lawful for the Secretary of State to certify, arrest, search, and detain on the basis of torture evidence, and this despite the 'mismatch' between the material on the basis of which the Secretary of State (the executive) and the SIAC (the judicial body) were able to act upon.⁸⁷ For example, Lord Nicholls expressed the opinion that the Government cannot be expected to close its eyes to information at the price of endangering the lives of its citizens,⁸⁸ and Lord Brown even indicated that the executive branch is bound to make use of all such information, as it is under a duty to safeguard the State.⁸⁹ In this respect, in its concluding observations the Committee noticed that ‘the State party should never rely on intelligence material obtained from third countries through the use of torture or other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment’.⁹⁰

43 Although States have a duty to protect all persons subject to their jurisdiction, the House of Lords’ decision does not seem to take into account the preventive rationale of Article 15, thus having the potential to undermining the absolute prohibition of torture and creating a market for torture tainted information. Moreover, in practice, it is very difficult to separate the use of evidence for operational purposes from that in legal proceedings.⁹¹ Hence, rather than excluding the application of Article 15 in view of the operational nature of the proceedings, it is believed that also in this case one would have to assess the formality of the proceedings. It would indeed be unreasonable to require the police to check the possible use of torture by foreign intelligence agencies before exercising their duty to prevent terrorist or other attacks and to protect the lives of human beings being endangered. Yet these preventive actions are not carried out in the framework of any proceedings envisaged in Article 15. As it was seen above, the application of Article 15 presupposes the assessment of evidence in a formal procedure which leads to a decision of the respective court or administrative agency. If the police receive information from a foreign intelligence service that a particular person is planning to commit a terrorist attack, they might detain the person even if they have reason to believe that the information may have been obtained by torture. On the contrary, a formal detention certificate—such as the one issued by the British Home Secretary under the Immigration and Asylum Part of the Anti-Terrorism, Crime, and Security Act 2001—is clearly an administrative decision arrived at in the course of formal administrative proceedings to which Article 15 CAT applies. Despite the fact that the December 2005 ruling of the House of Lords only applied to the judicial proceedings before the Special Immigration Appeals Commission and the Court of Appeal, it is beyond doubt that the standards developed by the House of Lords apply not only to the judicial bodies deciding on the lawfulness of deprivation of liberty in the second and third instance but also to the Home Secretary who issues the detention order in the first instance. In other words, if the Home Secretary bases his or her decision on foreign intelligence information which might have been extracted by torture, he or she must investigate by all appropriate means before issuing a formal detention certificate whether or not the respective statements are the result of torture.⁹²

44 Most importantly, it shall be noted that even when such evidence does not fall within the scope of application of this provision because the level of formality requested by Article 15 is not met, cooperation with foreign States practising torture, for example, by receiving and using torture tainted intelligence for operational purposes may still be prohibited under Article 4 of the Convention as well as under international law, in that it may amount to complicity in torture.⁹³

45 According to Article 15 only those statements that have been ‘established to have been made as a result of torture’ are inadmissible. This formulation gives room for different interpretations, as the case law of the Committee against Torture and relevant domestic courts show. A literal reading of Article 15 might even support an understanding which would require the person against whom the proceeding is being carried out to provide full evidence that his or her confession was extracted by torture, a burden of proof which in almost no case could be met. On the other hand, it might be equally difficult for the prosecutor or any other Government authority to provide full evidence that a given confession or witness statement was definitely not extracted by torture, in particular if such a statement was received from a foreign Government to support an extradition request or from a foreign intelligence service in support of a criminal charge or detention order. Thus, any interpretation which takes into account both the wording and the purpose of Article 15 must aim at striking a fair balance between the legitimate interests of the State and of the individual against whom the evidence is invoked.

46 The burden of proof is the issue of interpretation with which the Committee has confronted itself more often in the individual complaints procedure.⁹⁴ Since its decision PE v France of 2002, the Committee has consistently held that Article 15 derives from the absolute nature of the prohibition of torture and implies, consequently, an obligation for each State party to ascertain whether or not statements constituting part of the evidence of a procedure for which it is competent have been made as a result of torture.⁹⁵ By doing so, the Committee has set up a positive obligation upon States to examine whether evidence brought before them could be tainted by torture. This positive duty of the State mitigates the general rules on the burden of proof, which would normally require the complainant to prove his/her claim before the Committee,⁹⁶ and produces what is normally referred to as a ‘shift of the burden of proof’. Yet in order to trigger such procedure and thus the positive duty of the State, the complainant needs to allege prima facie evidence of the torture allegation, so as to demonstrate that his/her allegation are well-founded.⁹⁷

47 While until 2003 the Committee had decided only on four cases and found no violation of Article 15;⁹⁸ from 2004 until March 2017 it has found violation of Article 15 in eleven out of the fifteen cases it was called to decide upon.⁹⁹ Initially the Committee seemed to have given particular weight to the existence of medical reports or witness statements corroborating the allegations concerning Article 15, thereby setting up a very high threshold for the applicant.¹⁰⁰ However, in more recent cases, it has found violations of Article 15 also when the complainant was not able to produce any medical report or other corroborating evidence.¹⁰¹ In other words, once the complainant has brought an arguable claim before the Committee, the fact that the State party does not refute the allegations nor include any specific information on the applicant's claim in its observations to the Committee may be enough for the Committee to find a breach of Article 15.¹⁰² As additional corroborating arguments, the Committee has equally considered the fact that national courts failed to address adequately the complainant's allegations of forced confessions as a result of torture,¹⁰³ the existence of additional Convention violations, such as for example Article 12 for failure to carry out any investigations despite numerous complaints of torture,¹⁰⁴ or Article 3,¹⁰⁵ as well as the general situation concerning the implementation of this Convention provision by the State party as documented in its concluding observations.¹⁰⁶ Finally, in some cases, the Committee seems to have taken into account also whether the tainted statements had a decisive impact in the relevant proceedings.¹⁰⁷ This is surprising because, contrary to other instruments where the use of tainted evidence is prohibited on the basis of the right to a fair trial, Article 15 CAT sets up a specific exclusionary rule, which, besides protecting the right to a fair trial of the accused, equally aims to safeguard the integrity of the proceedings and prevent the use of torture. As these additional rationales would be frustrated regardless of the impact of the evidence on the final conviction, such an argument is irrelevant for the purpose of establishing a violation of Article 15. Moreover, even in systems where the use of torture evidence is prohibited on the basis of the right to a fair trial, such as the ECHR, it was concluded that, given the seriousness of the offence, the use of torture tainted evidence always renders automatically unfair the whole criminal proceedings, regardless of the probative value of the evidence and irrespective of whether they had a decisive impact in the final conviction.¹⁰⁸

48 In extradition proceedings, the Committee has considered in particular the status (eg pending¹⁰⁹ or not¹¹⁰) of the proceedings in which the complaint concerning the alleged ill-treatment is being investigated in the requesting State. According to the Committee it is in fact for domestic courts to evaluate facts and evidence in a particular case, ‘unless the evidence assessment is clearly arbitrary and amounts to a denial of justice’.¹¹¹ In practice, the Committee has found no violation of Article 15 where the ill-treatment complaints were still being investigated by the requesting State,¹¹² or when the requesting State’s authorities had already taken the decision to discontinue the investigation on the complaint.¹¹³ In the first situation the Committee found that it was not yet possible to establish that the statements had been extracted by torture. However, it is believed that if Article 15 is applicable to extradition proceedings, as the Committee accepted it to be, then it should be incumbent on the domestic authorities deciding on the extradition request to at least wait until the required evidence is established and produced by the requesting State.¹¹⁴ In the second situation, the Committee has taken the view that the decision of the requesting State authorities to discontinue the ill-treatment complaint was sufficient to establish that the statements had not been made in violation of Article 15. Though it would probably stretch the meaning of Article 15 beyond what can reasonably be expected from the authorities of the requested State to investigate torture complaints in the requesting State after its judicial authorities had closed the respective criminal proceedings, the approach taken by the Committee seems to give the authorities in the requesting State almost unlimited discretion to ‘establish’ that a given extradition request was not based on statements extracted by torture. A violation of Article 15 in extradition proceedings was found for the first time in the 2011 case Ktiti v Morocco.¹¹⁵ There, the Committee also found a breach of Article 3, thereby closely linking the guarantees under Article 15 to the prohibition of refoulement in Article 3 CAT. If a person cannot be extradited because of substantial grounds for believing that he or she would be in danger of being subjected to torture in the requesting State, then the authorities in the requested State are not discharged by their obligation to verify the content of the author’s allegations under Article 15 by simply relying on the results of the investigations in the requesting State. On the contrary, as clarified in Yousri Ktiti v Morocco, they will have to also ‘verify the content of the author’s allegations’.¹¹⁶

49 But the jurisprudence of the Committee adopted thus far does not assess the question of what test is to be applied in order to establish that evidence is obtained by torture. Such question has been however addressed by other domestic and international courts.¹¹⁷

50 Some national courts have applied a balance of probability test. For example, in the German case of El-Motassadeq,¹¹⁸ the defendant was charged with conspiracy to cause the attacks of 11 September 2011. The Hanseatic Higher Regional Court of Hamburg had to assess whether the summaries of the interrogations of three suspected Al-Qaeda members sent by the United States could be invoked and used as evidence in the criminal trial before it. In its procedural decision of 14 June 2005,¹¹⁹ the Hamburg Court decided to accept, as trial evidence, the full summaries of the testimonies given by the three witnesses cited above. The Court based this decision on the reasoning that Article 15 CAT only excluded statements as evidence which were established to have been made as a result of torture but that in the present case it was impossible for the Court to establish that the testimonies were in fact extracted by torture. Although the press articles and NGO reports heard in court supplied indications that alleged Al-Qaeda members had been tortured, the Court was unable to verify them, as no primary sources had been named. Moreover, since the summaries of the interrogations also contained exculpatory elements, this was taken as an indication that no torture had been used. Hence, in its judgment of 19 August 2005, the Hamburg Court sentenced Mr. El-Motassadeq to seven years' imprisonment for membership of a terrorist organization. In his reasoning, the presiding judge stated that the summaries sent by the US Department of Justice did not have sufficient probative value, positive or negative, with a view to the uncertainty over how the statements had been obtained. The testimonies of the US detainees had therefore only been taken into account, in considering the evidence and reaching a verdict, to the extent to which they had been clearly corroborated by other objective evidence.¹²⁰

51 The UK House of Lords concluded in a similar way in the judgment A and Others v SSHD of December 2005.¹²¹ On this occasion, the Law Lords agreed that the conventional approach to the burden of proof is inappropriate in relation to Article 15¹²² and on the need to devise a procedure that would afford protection to the appellant without imposing a burden of proof on either party that they would not be able to discharge.¹²³ But, most interestingly, they disagreed on the specific test to apply in relation to the standard of proof. Ultimately, the majority of the Law Lords took a position similar to those of the German authorities in El-Motassadeq and followed the balance of probability test establishing that evidence should be excluded only if by means of diligent inquiries it can be established that on a balance of probabilities it was obtained by torture. In case of doubt, evidence should be admitted.¹²⁴

52 Others maintained that a real risk test should be applied, arguing that a balance of probabilities test constituted a too high threshold which would be impossible to satisfy for the applicant, thus, undermining the practical efficacy of Convention. For example, the real risk test was put forward by the minority in A and Others v SSHD, where Lord Bingham argued that evidence should only be admitted if the court establishes that there is no such real risk that evidence is extracted by torture, but excluded in all other cases. Consequently, it would be for the appellant to first advance a plausible reason why evidence may have been procured by torture. But it would then be for the court to inquire as to whether there is a 'real risk' that the evidence has been obtained by torture.¹²⁵ Similarly, the ECtHR has applied the 'real risk' test in the case Othman (Abu Qatada) v UK arguing that it would be unfair to impose on the applicant a burden of proof that went beyond the demonstration of a ‘real risk’ that the evidence in question had been thus obtained.¹²⁶ In doing so, the ECtHR pointed out that when assessing the admissibility of torture tainted evidence, it is necessary to give due regard ‘to the special difficulties in proving allegations of torture’. The fact that torture is often practiced in secret, by experienced interrogators who are skilled at ensuring that it leaves no visible signs on the victim, and with the complicity of those who are charged with ensuring that torture does not occur—courts, prosecutors, and medical personnel—makes its proof particularly difficult. Hence, the ECtHR concluded that by proving a ‘real risk’ the applicant had discharged the burden that could be fairly imposed on him. Such an approach is also adopted by the Trial Chamber of the ECCC.¹²⁷

53 The use of a balance of probability test under Article 15 CAT by the Hamburg Court has been strongly criticized, as it sets up an unrealistically high standard of proof, making the application of the exclusionary rule illusory in cases, where the information is provided by the intelligence of a foreign country without disclosing the full text of the transcript or the whereabouts of the witnesses.¹²⁸ On the contrary, in light of well-founded allegations about the torture and enforced disappearance of the witnesses in US custody, it was the responsibility of the Prosecutor (or the Court) to prove beyond reasonable doubt that these testimonies were not extracted by torture, rather than to prove that they were actually obtained by torture.¹²⁹ For these reasons, it can be concluded that the real risk test is most in line with the letter and spirit of Article 15 CAT.¹³⁰

54 Moreover, also situations of enforced disappearance and incommunicado detention require special consideration. In this regard, for example, the African Commission has taken the view that ‘any confession or admission obtained during incommunicado detention shall be considered to have been obtained by coercion’ and hence not be admitted as evidence.¹³¹ On this point too, the decision taken in the El-Motassadeq case should be criticized.¹³² Though a careful analysis of the decision shows that the three witnesses whose testimony were in fact victims of enforced disappearance¹³³—the Hamburg Court held that prolonged incommunicado detention of less than three years and the denial of a proper trial did not amount to a particular serious human rights violation which would under section 136a of the German Criminal Procedure Code exclude the use of statements made during this secret detention.¹³⁴ This legal reasoning clearly underestimates the seriousness of the crime and human rights violation of enforced disappearance.¹³⁵ In a comparable case against Libya the HRC, for example, qualified a period of three years of incommunicado detention as even amounting to torture.¹³⁶ Similarly, the UN Commission on Human Rights has repeatedly stressed that prolonged incommunicado detention may facilitate the perpetration of torture and can itself constitute a form of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or even torture.¹³⁷ In other words, even before the adoption of the UN Convention on Enforced Disappearance,¹³⁸ the Hamburg Court should have applied Article 15 CAT and ruled out categorically the use of any statements made by persons held in incommunicado detention for a prolonged period of time. Whether the use of torture for the purpose of extracting information can be established or not is irrelevant in cases of enforced disappearances as the very fact that a person is kept incommunicado for a prolonged period of time amounts to torture or at least cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment.¹³⁹ If it is accepted, as the Hamburg Court reluctantly did, that courts use in criminal trials evidence provided by foreign intelligence services, which at the same time clearly admit that this evidence was obtained through interrogation of victims of enforced disappearance, then minimum standards of the international rule of law and human rights will start being seriously undermined.

3.4 Applicability to Statements Obtained as a Result of Cruel, Inhuman and Degrading Treatment or Punishment

55 Whereas Article 12 of the 1975 Declaration applies both to torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment, Article 15 CAT only refers to torture. This has to do with the fact that during the drafting of the CAT, States could not reach consensus on which State obligations should apply to all forms of ill-treatment and which to torture only. The compromise in Article 16, ie the deliberate decision to include a non-exhaustive list of CAT provisions which establish State obligations for all forms of ill-treatment, causes difficult questions of interpretation. In fact, many States wished to apply Article 15 to all forms of ill-treatment.¹⁴⁰

56 In its 2008 General Comment on Article 2, the Committee considered that ‘articles 3 to 15 are likewise obligatory as applied to both torture and ill-treatment’.¹⁴¹ Similarly, in the reporting procedure, it suggested repeatedly that statements made as a result of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment (and therefore not only torture) may not be used as evidence in any proceedings.¹⁴² But in the individual complaint procedure the Committee has decided in the negative and in the 2014 decision of Kirsanov v Russia it explicitly clarified that

[w]ith regard to the alleged violations of articles 14 and 15 of the Convention, the Committee notes that the scope of application of the said provisions only refers to torture in the sense of article 1 of the Convention and does not cover other forms of ill-treatment. Moreover, article 16, paragraph 1, of the Convention, though specifically referring to articles 10, 11, 12 and 13, does not mention articles 14 and 15 of the Convention...¹⁴³

57 In the academic literature, the opinion seems to prevail that Article 15 applies exclusively to torture.¹⁴⁴ Yet a systematic interpretation of Articles 15 and 16 in light of the travaux préparatoires leads to the conclusion that those CAT provisions which are directly related to criminal law only apply to torture, whereas the more preventive obligations of States can also apply to all forms of ill-treatment.¹⁴⁵ Since one of the purposes of Article 15 is connected to criminal proceedings, one could argue that it applies exclusively to torture. On the other hand, Article 15 also has a clear and important preventive purpose, which supports a broader interpretation. Moreover, the developments recalled above show that Article 15 does not apply only to criminal proceedings but also to civil and administrative ones, as well as to any other formal proceedings. Hence, Article 15 cannot be regarded as a provision only ‘related to criminal law’. Lastly, the application of the exclusionary rule to other forms of ill-treatment is widely supported by the practice of other international bodies, including the HRC¹⁴⁶ and the SRT,¹⁴⁷ as well as the practice of several States.¹⁴⁸

¹⁴⁸ cf Akma Niyazmatov, ‘Evidence Obtained by Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment: Why the Convention Against Torture’s Exclusionary Rule Should Be Inclusive’ (Cornell Law School Inter-University Graduate Student Conference Paper 2011). Niyazmatov’s comparative study shows that Canada, the United States, Argentina, Mexico, Germany, the United Kingdom, Japan, China, Russia, and South Africa apply the exclusionary rule also the cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment and punishment.

58 In any event, even if Article 15 was to apply to other forms of ill-treatment, the result would not be that different. This provision aims at preventing confessions and other statements obtained by coercion from being used as evidence in judicial or administrative proceedings, and to extract a confession or information during interrogation of a detainee is, the classical purpose of torture as defined in Article 1.¹⁴⁹ In other words, if interrogation methods aimed at obtaining a confession or other information cause severe pain or suffering, then they amount not only to cruel and inhuman treatment, but also to torture. If they do not reach this level of pain or suffering, they are not prohibited by the CAT unless their particularly humiliating nature can be considered as degrading treatment. The only question of interpretation which remains, therefore, is whether a statement which has been obtained by degrading treatment causing non-severe pain or suffering may be invoked as evidence in any proceedings. In light of the preventive purpose of Article 15, this question can be answered in the affirmative although its practical significance seems to be limited.¹⁵⁰

3.5 Exception to the Rule

59 Article 15 provides in its last part that the exclusionary rule does not apply 'against a person accused of torture as evidence that the statement was made'. This exception clause is not contained in Article 12 of the 1975 Declaration. It appears first in Article VII of the IAPL draft.¹⁵¹ In comments based on Article 13 of the original Swedish draft, the Austrian delegate sought to include the IAPL provision since Article 13 of the Swedish draft could be interpreted 'in a manner which would prohibit the prosecution of a person accused of having inflicted torture'. Similarly, the United States proposed the following formulation: '... except that it (the statement) may be invoked in evidence against a person accused of having obtained such statement by torture'.¹⁵² This debate was then reflected in the revised Swedish draft,¹⁵³ as well as in the final version adopted by the Working Group reading as follows: 'except against a person accused of torture as evidence that the statement was made.'¹⁵⁴ In contrast to the US proposal and revised Swedish draft, which broader formulation appeared to allow an 'unlimited use' of evidence against suspected torturers, Article 15 seems to permit the use of tainted statements only for the purpose of proving that the statement was in fact obtained through torture thus enabling a 'limited use' of torture tainted evidence.¹⁵⁵

60 The purpose of this provision is thus very clear. The drafters wished to confirm explicitly that the rule did not exclude the use of any statements extracted by torture in a criminal procedure against the alleged torturer. Whether such an explicit exception clause was needed is, however, doubtful. As Burgers and Danelius already showed in their 1988 Handbook, this exception 'is more apparent than real'.¹⁵⁶ The rule of Article 15 in fact means that the evidence resulting from torture, that is to say the substance of a confession or other statement extracted by torture, should not be used. However, in a criminal trial against the torturer, the prosecutor needs to prove that torture was inflicted, and the victim may give testimony about the torture methods applied and the pain and suffering endured. In other words, what the drafters wished to ensure is less that the contents of a statement could be used as evidence against the torturer, but rather the very fact that the victim made a statement as a result of torture could be proved. Thus, strictly speaking, this provision does not provide an exception to the rule as it does not affect the validity of the principle expressed in Article 15. But it certainly also does no harm to state the obvious.

61 This approach has been recently challenged by the prosecution in the proceedings before the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia (ECCC),¹⁵⁷ where the prosecutors tried to depart from the standard interpretation recalled above.¹⁵⁸ Once realized that the evidence against the Khmer Rouge officials was limited, the prosecutors tried to use evidence originating from the detention and torture centre at Tuol Sleng that would have otherwise been excluded to prove the criminal responsibility of the Khmer Rouge leaders as well as the ECCC jurisdiction.¹⁵⁹ Starting from the standpoint that ‘barrier tainted evidence would reward those who participated in bringing about torture’, they argued that the sentence ‘as evidence that the statement was made’ implied that the use of torture statements against the suspect torturers is prohibited only to prove facts related to the truth of the matter ‘confessed’ but can be used for any other purpose than to prove the truth of its content.¹⁶⁰

62 In some early decisions the ECCC refused this approach arguing that ‘there is no room for determination of the truth or for use otherwise of any statements obtained through torture’ thus confirming that tainted evidence may be relied upon only as proof that a statement was obtained through torture.¹⁶¹ Yet in a later decision of February 2016, the ECCC—Trial Chamber saw fit going back on the issue of admissibility of torture tainted evidence and taking a different stance.¹⁶² In doing so, it observed that ‘Article 15 does not clarify how a statement may be used and for what purpose(s)’.¹⁶³ The Trial Chamber maintained that proving that a statement was obtained through torture is only one of the purposes allowed by Article 15, and consequently agreed to the use of the tainted statements also for other additional purposes such as to determine what action resulted based on the fact that a statement was made,¹⁶⁴ or to demonstrate the proof of reliance on this information by the accused or others within the CPK structure.¹⁶⁵

63 In a partially dissenting opinion, Judge Fenz criticized this interpretation arguing that the majority had wrongly broadened the scope of the exception ‘from allowing the use of a statement obtained by torture for one purpose to allowing the use of such statement for all purposes but one (ie to establish its truth)’.¹⁶⁶ She reaffirmed that ‘the purpose of the “exception” is not to establish a substantive exception to the rule but to prevent—by way of this clarification—an overly extensive interpretation of Article 15 which would have indeed bordered on absurd’.¹⁶⁷ In fact, as some commentators have already opined, it is believed that disregarding the rationale of the integrity or fairness of the proceedings in the name of evidentiary efficiency makes a ‘disservice to international criminal justice’.¹⁶⁸ This position is further supported by other international instruments (eg CCPR) and regional bodies (eg Inter-American Convention).¹⁶⁹

64 As to the personal scope of the exception to the rule, there is consensus on the fact that the term ‘persons accused of torture’ encompasses not only the direct perpetrator, but also any other person prosecuted for torture under other modes of criminal responsibility (eg superior responsibility).¹⁷⁰ This view is also supported by the drafting history of Article 15. In fact, whilst the Revised Swedish Draft referred to ‘a person accused of obtaining that statement by torture’, the final text of the Convention generally point at ‘a person accused of torture’.¹⁷¹

Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

1. Each State Party shall undertake to prevent in any territory under its jurisdiction other acts of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment which do not amount to torture as defined in article 1, when such acts are committed by or at the instigation of or with the consent or acquiescence of a public official or other person acting in an official capacity. In particular, the obligations contained in articles 10, 11, 12 and 13 shall apply with the substitution for references to torture of references to other forms of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.
2. The provisions of this Convention are without prejudice to the provisions of any other international instrument or national law which prohibit cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment or which relate to extradition or expulsion.

1. Introduction

1 The human right to personal integrity is usually defined as the right not to be subjected to torture or to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.¹ The CAT was not adopted to reaffirm these prohibitions but to ‘make more effective the struggle against torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment throughout the world',² in particular through the creation of specific State obligations to punish the perpetrators and to prevent such practices. Article 16 mirrors Article 2 and provides a broad obligation of States to prevent cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. Issues of interpretation that have been thoroughly debated are the scope of Article 16 and which State obligations, as outlined by the Convention, are not only applicable to torture, but also to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. Developments over time in terms of how to interpret these State obligations can especially be witnessed vis-à-vis the legal qualification of corporal and capital punishment.

2. Travaux Préparatoires

2 Although the General Assembly had instructed the Commission in 1977 to draw up a draft Convention on torture and other forms of ill-treatment, it was clear that certain State obligations should only apply to the practice of torture. Some States, such as the United States, even suggested that the Convention should exclusively or at least primarily focus on torture alone.³ Similarly, the IAPL draft only covered torture. The Swedish draft, on the other hand, in line with the 1975 Declaration, defined torture as an aggravated and deliberate form of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment and intended to make most provisions applicable to both torture and other forms of ill-treatment.

3 During the deliberations in the Working Group, the following compromise was achieved: in principle, the Convention only applies to torture as defined in Article 1(1), but in Article 16, States parties shall undertake also to prevent other acts of ill-treatment which 'do not amount to torture as defined in article 1'. This means, first of all, that it was originally envisaged that all obligations related to the use of criminal law, ie Articles 4 to 9, only apply to torture. The obligation to prevent other forms of ill-treatment was accentuated by the second sentence in Article 16(1) according to which 'in particular, the obligations contained in articles 10, 11, 12, and 13 shall apply with the substitution for references to torture of references to other forms of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment'. But the Convention also contains provisions which are neither criminal nor purely preventive in nature, ie Articles 3, 14, and 15. The reference to these provisions in Article 16 was originally contained in brackets but later deleted in order to achieve a consensus. On the other hand, the words 'in particular' indicate that the reference to Articles 10, 11, 12, and 13 is not exhaustive. Whether the obligations contained in other provisions, above all the obligation in Article 14 to ensure that the victim obtains redress, compensation, and rehabilitation, only apply to torture or also to other forms of ill-treatment, needs, therefore, to be resolved by means of interpretation. The Committee has also provided more guidance in recent years, eg through its General Comments.

4 During the drafting of Article 16, it also soon became clear that a proper definition of the terms cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment was impossible to achieve. The precise meaning of these words is also in need of interpretation. Finally, the Convention does not contain any specific human right not to be subjected to torture or other forms of ill-treatment. Article 16(1) only creates a State obligation to prevent cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, similar to the obligation in Article 2(1) to take effective measures to prevent torture. The question, therefore, arises whether Article 16 can be invoked as an individual right before domestic courts and in the individual complaints procedure before the Committee, which is clearly to be answered in the affirmative.⁴

3. Issues of Interpretation

3.1 Meaning of Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

5 There is no definition of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment (hereinafter also referred to as 'other forms of ill-treatment') in international treaties, but it is commonly distinguished from torture as defined under Article 1.⁵ However, from the drafting history of the Convention and the discussions on the definition of torture, it becomes clear that the drafters had relied more on the approach taken by the European Commission of Human Rights in the Greek case than on the approach of the European Court of Human Rights in the Northern Ireland case.⁶ It follows that the decisive criteria for distinguishing torture from cruel and inhuman treatment is the purpose of the conduct, the intention of the perpetrator, and the powerlessness of the victim.⁷

6 Cruel and inhuman treatment or punishment, therefore, can be defined as the infliction of severe pain or suffering, whether physical or mental, by or at the instigation of or with the consent or acquiescence of a public official or other person acting in an official capacity. Such conduct can be both intentional or negligent, with or without a particular purpose. It does not require the specific situation of detention or direct control of the victim by the perpetrator, which is characteristic only for torture.⁸ Cruel and inhuman treatment or punishment, therefore, also encompasses excessive use of force by law enforcement officials for other purposes, such as defending a person from unlawful violence, effecting a lawful arrest, preventing the escape of a person lawfully detained, quelling a riot or insurrection, or dissolving a demonstration (see section 3.7 below). Outside the narrow scope of torture, the infliction of severe pain or suffering may be justified if such use of force serves a legitimate purpose and is not excessive.

7 The principle of proportionality must, therefore, be applied in order to assess whether the infliction of severe pain or suffering amounts to cruel or inhuman treatment or punishment. If the use of force is not necessary and in the specific circumstances of the case not proportional with the purpose achieved, it amounts to cruel or inhuman treatment.

Once a person is powerless, ie is under direct physical or equivalent control of the perpetrator and has lost the capacity to resist or escape the infliction of pain or suffering, the proportionality is no longer applicable.⁹

8 There are no clear legal criteria for distinguishing cruel from inhuman treatment, apart from our common understanding of the meaning of the words ‘cruel’ and ‘inhuman’.¹⁰ However, in practice this seems to be of little relevance and a distinction has so far not been made by the Committee.

9 Degrading treatment or punishment can be defined as the infliction of pain or suffering, whether physical or mental, which aims at humiliating the victim. Even the infliction of pain or suffering which does not reach the threshold of ‘severe’ must be considered as degrading treatment or punishment if it contains a particularly humiliating element.¹¹ According to the ECtHR and the European Commission of Human Rights, a treatment or punishment will be degrading ‘if it grossly humiliates [the victim] before others or drives him to act against his will or conscience’¹² and when ‘it was such as to arouse in the victims feelings of fear, anguish and inferiority capable of humiliating and debasing [victims]’.¹³ The Court has found a violation also when there was no evidence of intent to humiliate or debase the victim. The UNSRT and ECtHR have found the forcible and discriminatory testing for HIV and Hepatitis C,¹⁴ the shackling or handcuffing in front of a public,¹⁵ or even the unjustified use of force in detention that does not reach the level of severity (such as a slap in the face of a juvenile)¹⁶ as constituting examples for degrading treatment.

10 As for torture, also cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment can be committed by public officials by instigation, consent, and acquiescence which need to be interpreted like the terms in article 1 (see further section 3.8 herein below).¹⁷ This obligation of States parties to act with due diligence is part of the general obligation to protect individuals against widespread human rights violations by private parties.¹⁸ This is particularly important as States are increasingly delegating part of their law enforcement, intelligence, and military operations to private companies outsourcing selected tasks, including the use of force, to running entire detention facilities. Thus the UNSRT has recalled that

States cannot absolve themselves from their international legal responsibility for acts of torture and other forms of ill-treatment.¹⁹

11 The Committee has given various examples of acts that either amount to torture or ‘other acts of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment which do not amount to torture as defined in article’ in its Concluding observations. Situations that may constitute cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment are, but not limited to, poor conditions of detention, corporal and capital punishment, excessive use of force, and failing to protect individuals from ill-treatment by private actors, eg domestic violence, female genital mutilation, and trafficking in human beings, all of which are addressed in the sub-sections below.²⁰ However, if the additional definition criteria for torture are fulfilled, these practices may also amount to torture.²¹

12 The United States entered a reservation and considers itself bound by the obligation under Article 16 only in so far as the term ‘cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment’ means the cruel, unusual and inhumane treatment or punishment prohibited by the Fifth, Eighth, and/or Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution.²² Several member States objected to this reservation as being incompatible with the object and purpose of the Convention,²³ and also the Committee considered this reservation explicitly as a violation of the CAT.²⁴ The United States later argued that the reservation ‘does not introduce any limitation to the geographic applicability of article 16’, and that ‘the obligations in article 16 apply beyond the sovereign territory of the United States to any territory under its jurisdiction’ but it did not follow the Committee’s recommendation to withdraw the reservation.²⁵

Moreover, it is not clear how the provisions of the Constitution of the United States of America relate to the obligations under the Convention. The Government of the Kingdom of the Netherlands therefore objects to the said reservation. This objection shall not preclude the entry into force of the Convention between the Kingdom of the Netherlands and the United States of America.’

The same reasons for objection apply to the now entered reservation with regard to article 16 reservation I (1) of [the Convention]. The Government of Sweden therefore objects to that reservation.’

‘A reservation which consists of a general reference to national law without specifying its contents does not clearly define to the other Parties of the Convention the extent to which the reserving State commits itself to the Convention and therefore may cast doubts about the commitment of the reserving State to fulfill its obligations under the Convention. Such a reservation is also, in the view of the Government of Finland, subject to the general principle to treaty interpretation according to which a party may not invoke the provisions of its internal law as justification for failure to perform a treaty. The Government of Finland therefore objects to the reservation made by the United States to article 16 of the Convention.’ Finland (27 February 1996). See below Appendix A4.

3.2 Applicability of Articles 3 to 15 to Other Forms of Ill-Treatment

13 Under Article 16, States parties undertake 'to prevent' acts of ill-treatment.²⁶ In the second sentence of Article 16(1), the drafters, after long and controversial discussions, specified the obligation to prevent as follows: 'In particular, the obligations contained in articles 10, 11, 12 and 13 shall apply with the substitution for references to torture of references to other forms of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.' During the drafting, many States wished to add to this list of obligations those contained in Articles 3, 14, and 15.²⁷ Since an agreement could not be reached, these references were deleted from the draft, and the words 'in particular' added in order to show that this reference is not exhaustive.²⁸

14 There has been a lengthy discussion around the interpretation of the words 'in particular', arguing either that all rules of the Convention mutatis mutandis are applicable also to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment²⁹ or that it does not go beyond the obligations covered by Articles 10 to 13.³⁰

15 In its General Comment No 2 the Committee appeared to favour a broad interpretation stipulating that: 'Article 16, identifying the means of prevention of ill-treatment, emphasizes "in particular" the measures outlined in articles 10 to 13, but does not limit effective prevention to these articles.'³¹ As reasons it states that the obligations to prevent torture and other forms of ill-treatment are 'indivisible, interdependent and interrelated',³² overlapping and largely congruent in practice. The definitional threshold between them is often not clear and according to experience the very same conditions that enable ill-treatment also facilitate torture. The Committee therefore concludes that 'the measures required to prevent torture must be applied to prevent ill-treatment'.³³ However, this broad interpretation has to be read in the context in which General Comment No 2 was drafted, namely in the light of the atrocities committed in the name of the so called 'war on terror' (eg the incidents of Abu Ghraib) and the threat to the absolute prohibition of torture.³⁴ The purpose of the Committee's extensive interpretation was thus to reject any attempts to justify torture and other forms of ill-treatment and to bolster its absolute prohibition. This is confirmed by the Committee's subsequent practice where it has not upheld its view that all articles of the CAT apply equally to torture and other forms of ill-treatment.

³⁰ While Ingelse (n 4) 248 concedes that the wording 'in particular' in Art 16 (1) does not exclude the obligations following from the other Articles from being applicable to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment in the sense of Art 16, he is critical of Voyame: 'Voyame goes very far by stating without basis that all rules of the Convention mutatis mutandis are applicable to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment'.

³⁴ See ibid., paras 5, 6.

16 A literal interpretation of the term ‘in particular’ suggests that neither the Convention as a whole nor exclusively the articles mentioned in Article 16 should apply to other forms of ill-treatment. The wording explicitly leaves it open, suggesting that an applicability to other than the mentioned articles is possible.

17 When looking at the Convention as a whole it becomes clear that Article 16 cannot apply to all articles of the Convention as otherwise there would be no reason to separate between Article 2 and 16 in the first place. Moreover Article 16 refers to the obligation of States parties to ‘prevent’ other forms of ill-treatment not amounting to torture and specifically confirms the applicability of the key preventive articles 10 to 13 to other forms of ill-treatment. In that regard it stands clearly separate from the preceding Articles 4 to 9 that—despite their preventive effect—are primarily of a repressive (criminal) nature. The objective thus seems to be that the mainly preventive obligations can also apply to other forms of ill-treatment unlike the obligations of States parties to use domestic criminal law for the purpose of investigating any crime of torture and bringing the perpetrators to justice. The travaux préparatoires equally show that all the provisions relating to the criminal prosecution of the perpetrators of torture (Articles 4 to 9) would only apply to torture in the narrow sense of Article 1, with one argument being the difficulty to define cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, because these terms were not defined in the Convention.³⁵ Only the three provisions, which were put in square brackets during the deliberations in the Working Group (Articles 3, 14 and 15), were considered controversial.

18 This means that the obligations deriving from Articles 4 to 9 apply exclusively to torture, as defined in Article 1. States are, therefore, not required to introduce the offence of inhuman treatment as a crime in domestic law and apply the principle of universal jurisdiction to these forms of ill-treatment. On the other hand, the obligations to prevent torture by means of education and training, by systematically reviewing interrogation rules and practices, by ensuring a prompt and impartial ex officio investigation, and by ensuring an effective complaints mechanism, as laid down in Articles 10 to 13, must be applied equally to torture and other forms of ill-treatment. The applicability of the other provisions of CAT must be considered in light of their specific purpose; in particular, whether these obligations are more of a preventive or repressive (criminal) nature.

19 The principle of non-refoulement in Article 3 is of preventive nature while at the same time clearly separated from the key preventive articles in the Convention. This confirms its specific importance for the prevention of torture as well as the particular nature of the obligation—relating to a risk of torture in another State. The systematic position and separation from the other preventive articles suggests that the applicability to ill-treatment was not intended. This interpretation is confirmed by the travaux préparatoires, showing that during the drafting process, many Governments, above all the United States, clearly stated that this principle only applies to the danger of being subjected to torture in the most narrow sense.³⁶ Moreover, in its first General Comment to Article 3 of 1998, the Committee made clear that ‘Article 3 is confined in its application to cases where there are substantial grounds for believing that the author would be in danger of being subjected to torture as defined in article 1 of the Convention’.³⁷ Consequently in its first decision in an individual case on this issue, BS v Canada, the Committee noted that Article 3 does not encompass situations of ill-treatment envisaged by Article 16³⁸ and it has followed this line in its subsequent decisions, also in case law adopted after its General Comment 2 on Article 2.³⁹

20 At the same time, the Committee in the case MMK v Sweden (regarding a complaint from a Bangladeshi citizen alleging a violation of Article 16 due to his ‘fragile psychiatric condition and severe PTSD’) observed that in very exceptional circumstances a removal per se may constitute cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment and thus violate Article 16 (although such exceptional circumstances had not been presented in the complainant’s case).⁴⁰ Thereby the Committee acknowledges the fact that the duty to prevent torture (Article 2) and other forms of ill-treatment (Article 16) overlap in practice and the definitional threshold is often not clear. This reasoning is confirmed by the revised General Comment No 1 to Article 3 of 2017 in which the Committee interprets Article 3 to apply only to cases of torture, while nevertheless referencing its General Comment No 2. The Committee found that ‘States parties should consider whether forms of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment that a person facing deportation is at risk of experiencing could likely change so as to constitute torture before making an assessment on each case relating to the principle of “non-refoulement.”’⁴¹ Moreover it clarifies that ‘the fact that Article 3 of the Convention only deals with torture should not be interpreted as limiting the prohibition against extradition or expulsion which follows from such other instruments’.⁴² The position of the Committee is therefore clear insofar as the application of Article 3 does not extend to other forms of ill-treatment. However, this does not exclude the protection from ill-treatment by Article 16 or other non-refoulement principles as derived from Articles 3 ECHR or 7 ICCPR. Seemingly for that reason, the Committee has also recommended to States in some Concluding observations to provide protection from refoulement beyond the scope of Article 3 to ensure that no person in need of protection is returned to a country where he/she is in danger of being subjected to acts of torture and other forms of ill-treatment.⁴³

21 Nevertheless, the Committee’s position is narrower regarding the applicability of the prohibition of non-refoulement than positions of other international organs: the

ECtHR has applied the prohibition of refoulement under Article 3 ECHR equally to the risk of torture and other forms of ill-treatment,⁴⁴ and the UN Human Rights Committee has followed this jurisprudence in relation to Article 7 CCPR.⁴⁵ The UNSRT has stated: 'States are prohibited from returning anyone to a situation where there are substantial grounds to believe that the person may be subject to torture or ill-treatment.'⁴⁶

22 Regarding the right to remedy and reparation contained in Article 14 the Committee has held in its first case on the matter, *Hajrizi Dzemajl et al v Yugoslavia*⁴⁷ in 2002 that its scope of application only refers to torture and not to other forms of ill-treatment.⁴⁸ Nevertheless, it stipulated that the first sentence of Article 16 encompasses the positive obligation to grant redress and compensate the victims.⁴⁹ The Committee has consequently stated that the State party has failed to observe its obligations under Article 16 when not providing the complainant with redress and fair and adequate compensation (but not of Article 14).⁵⁰ However, ten years later the Committee took a different position in its General Comment No 3 of 2012, considering that it is 'applicable to all victims of torture and acts of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment'.⁵¹ This position was however not retained and in the case Sergei Kirsanov v Russia the Committee again rejected the applicability of Article 14 to ill-treatment and only found a violation of Article 16.⁵²

23 This result is confusing and unsatisfactory. The Committee clearly interprets the words 'to prevent' in Article 16 in a broad sense, to include the positive obligation to grant redress and compensate the victims of an act in breach of Article 16. This is also confirmed by the travaux préparatoires indicating that no State had a strong argument against including the right to remedy and reparation in the indicative list of provisions referred to in Article 16(1), but that concerns focused primarily at applying the concept of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment in criminal law.⁵³ Moreover, the words 'in particular' in the second sentence of Article 16(1) must have some normative sense, as confirmed by the Committee itself in its General Comment. The consequences of ill-treatment for the victim can be the same as with torture and it appears that the Committee intended to extend the scope of Article 14 to afford its broadest protection.⁵⁴ Therefore, Article 14 must be interpreted to extend to other forms of ill-treatment.

⁵⁴ This interpretation was equally confirmed during a meeting with Committee members on 21 November 2017.

24 A similar argument can be made regarding Article 15 that has a preventive purpose and is placed among the preventive obligations rather than those of a repressive (criminal) nature.⁵⁵ It is moreover one of the articles that many States wished to add during the drafting phase to be explicitly mentioned under the list of obligations in Article 16.⁵⁶ However, even if one were to follow the view that Article 15 only applies to torture, in practice, if Article 15 were applied to other forms of ill-treatment, the result would not be different, because the provision aims at preventing confessions and other statements extracted during interrogation from being used as evidence in court. But extraction of confessions and information is the classical and most widespread purpose of torture. Any severe pain or suffering inflicted for the purpose of extracting a confession or other information therefore constitutes not only cruel and inhuman treatment but also torture.⁵⁷

3.3 State Obligations to Prevent Cruel, Inhuman and Degrading Treatment or Punishment

25 The Committee has elaborated in its individual complaints procedure, as well as in its Concluding Observations, how it interprets Article 16 and the State obligations emanating out of it. In its Concluding Observations the Committee usually references both, Articles 2 and 16 (often in combination with Article 11), thereby acknowledging what it had argued in its General Comment on Article 2, namely that in practice the obligations to prevent torture and ill-treatment are overlapping and that the State's obligations under Articles 2 and 16 have to be considered as 'indivisible, interdependent and interrelated'.⁵⁸ Despite the explicit absence of a prohibition, acts of torture and other forms of ill-treatment in the Convention must be interpreted as a violation of Article 2 and 16 respectively and can be claimed before the Committee.⁵⁹ This was explicitly accepted by the Committee in numerous cases, mostly with regard to unacceptable conditions of detention, but also in cases of enforced disappearances as well as where abuses were committed by law enforcement officials outside detention.⁶⁰

3.4 Prevention of Ill-Treatment in Detention

3.4.1 Ensuring Adequate Material Conditions of Detention

26 In his final report as UNSRT, Manfred Nowak identified a 'global prison crisis'.⁶¹ In far too many countries in all world regions, the general conditions of detention (overcrowding, lack of adequate food, healthcare, and natural light, and deplorable sanitary conditions, etc) are so poor that they can only be described as cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment. Many detainees report that they suffer more from such prison conditions than the torture methods that they have been subjected to in the first days of interrogation, although even the worst forms of detention conditions cannot be characterized as torture because the elements of intention and a specific purpose are lacking.

27 The Committee has found a number of violations of Article 16, mostly in conjunction with Article 11, due to insufficient detention conditions in the individual complaints procedure, such as in Abdulrahman Kabura v Burundi where the complainant was cramped in a cell of 12m² with 10 other detainees, without windows or light and without water, food or any medicines for 17 days, where detainees were forced to drink water from the toilet to survive.⁶² In Boniface Ntikarabera v Burundi a violation of Article 16 in conjunction with Article 11 was found by the Committee because the detention situation was characterized by overcrowding, insanitary conditions, no access to a doctor and the absence of a monitoring mechanism.⁶³ In Sergei Kirsanov v Russian Federation, the complainant was held in a temporary confinement ward for three-and-a-half months and again for approximately one month, without any bedding or toiletry items, no toilet, table, or sink, only seldom showers, and then, only with cold water, and no walks outside. Additionally, there were insects in the cell and the light always on, no ventilation, and food only once a day—consequently, the Committee found a violation of Article 16.⁶⁴ In order to constitute ill-treatment the conditions of detention must attain a minimum level of severity which depends on all circumstances of the case but is usually reached with an accumulation of different factors.⁶⁵

28 Thus, Article 16 entails a positive obligation towards persons deprived of liberty to ensure adequate material conditions similarly to the obligations derived from Articles 7 and 10 ICCPR.⁶⁶ The Committee emphasizes that detention conditions have to be in line with the internationally recognized standards, particularly the UN Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners (Mandela Rules),⁶⁷ by reducing overcrowding and taking effective measures to improve conditions of detention.⁶⁸ States parties should ensure that detainees have access to medical, psychosocial, and mental healthcare, hygiene and basic necessities, access to drinking water, and at least two meals per day as well as natural and artificial light and ventilation in the cells.⁶⁹ States parties should also take measures to eradicate corruption in prisons⁷⁰ and increase the number of staff and especially female prison officers.⁷¹ A lack of resources cannot be invoked by States to justify prison conditions that are not in compliance with minimum international standards, as confirmed by the Human Rights Committee⁷² and the UNSRT.⁷³ Certain minimum standards must be observed regardless of a State's resources and level of development.⁷⁴

29 The Committee has several times asked States to improve the capacity of prisons through renovations, in some instances also recommended the establishment of additional prison facilities to comply with international standards, such as sufficient living space for each detainee.⁷⁵ While in some instances old facilities need to be closed and new ones built because it is not possible to bring them in line with international standards, it is important to point out that in situations of overcrowding, instead of building additional prisons, it should always be alternatives to detention that are fostered.

3.4.2 Ensuring Discipline and Security In Line with Human Dignity of Detainees

30 In order to maintain and restore security and discipline in places of detention officials sometimes resort to practices that may violate the human dignity of detainees. Article 16 prohibits any use of force that is not strictly necessary and proportionate to a legitimate aim to be achieved such as in self-defence, or to prevent escape or physical resistance.⁷⁶ The Committee has addressed different risk situations in that regard reaching from body searches and measures of restraint to specific conditions of treatment such as solitary confinement and incommunicado detention.

31 The Committee has found that invasive and humiliating body searches of individuals detained or deprived of their liberty can constitute ill-treatment and urged that they should be conducted only where absolutely necessary and in full compliance with international standards.⁷⁷ This is also specified in the Mandela Rules stipulating that searches should only be undertaken in private and by trained staff of the same sex as the prisoner, respectful of the inherent human dignity and privacy of the individual. searches should be carried out by healthcare professionals other than those primarily responsible for the care of prisoners or, at a minimum, by appropriately trained personnel.⁷⁸

32 The authorities shall resort to measures of restraint only in exceptional circumstances.⁷⁹ The Committee has emphasized that their use should be kept under constant review and appropriately recorded.⁸⁰ Moreover, it has called for the abolition of certain methods such as electro-shock stun belts and restraint chairs that ‘almost invariably leads to breaches of article 16’.⁸¹

33 The Committee expressed its concern about solitary confinement for disciplinary violations for up to fourteen days and for up to two months to prevent escape, violation of life, or death of other persons and other crimes.⁸² Solitary confinement is defined by the Mandela rules as ‘the confinement of prisoners for 22 hours or more a day without meaningful human contact’;⁸³ prolonged solitary confinement is understood as confinement without meaningful human contact for a time period in excess of fifteen consecutive days.⁸⁴ Solitary confinement can have serious effects on mental health; the Committee has therefore repeatedly acknowledged that especially prolonged solitary confinement may constitute torture or ill-treatment.⁸⁵ When determining whether solitary confinement amounts to a violation of Article 16 there are several factors the Committee considers: the specific conditions of the solitary confinement, the stringency of the measure, the duration, the objective pursued, and the effect on the person concerned.⁸⁶

34 The Committee has expressly stated that States parties should limit the use of solitary confinement as a measure of last resort, for a period of time as short as possible and under strict supervision, with the possibility for judicial review, as well as in line with international standards.⁸⁷ The Committee even recommended the abolition of solitary confinement,⁸⁸ and underlined that even in high security facilities it should never be applied to persons with a psychosocial disability.⁸⁹

35 The UNSRT has urged States to prohibit solitary confinement as punishment due to the severe mental pain or suffering it may cause and recommended to develop and apply alternative disciplinary sanctions.⁹⁰ When solitary confinement is used, harmful effects on the detainee should be minimized by ensuring access to adequate exercise, social and mental stimulation, and regular monitoring of health.⁹¹ The UNSRT also argued that the use of solitary confinement in pre-trial detention should be ended and that solitary confinement for juveniles and persons with mental disabilities should be abolished.⁹² Also indefinite solitary confinement should be abolished. According to the Bangkok Rules pregnant women or women with young children must also never be placed in solitary confinement.⁹³ According to the UNSRT 'solitary confinement used on death row is by definition prolonged and indefinite and thus constitutes cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment or even torture'.⁹⁴

36 The Committee has expressed concern about the system of holding persons in incommunicado detention, where in contrast to solitary confinement, nobody, apart from the authorities, has contact with the detainee. While prolonged incommunicado detention and enforced disappearances in any case constitute a human rights violation for both the victim and close family members, solitary confinement might be justified for certain purposes (such as preventing evidence from being distorted) within certain time limits. However, the Committee has stated that regardless of the legal safeguards for its application, incommunicado detention for up to five days with no access to a lawyer, a doctor of choice, nor the ability to notify the family 'facilitates the commission of acts of torture and ill-treatment'.⁹⁵ Thus, it has repeatedly recommended in its Concluding Observations to abolish the practices of incommunicado detention altogether.⁹⁶ If used it is to be explicitly and strictly regulated by law and has to be subject to 'stringent judicial supervision'.⁹⁷

3.4.3 Prevention of Inter-Prisoner Violence

37 The Committee has repeatedly expressed its concern and addressed the issue of inter-prisoner violence in its Concluding observations.⁹⁸ As ill-treatment can be committed by public officials through instigation, consent, and acquiescence, States parties have a duty to prevent and eliminate inter-prisoner violence. If the State fails to act with due diligence to prevent inter-prisoner violence this can amount to ill-treatment.⁹⁹ The Committee has acknowledged overcrowding, lack of staff, limited space and inadequate material conditions, lack of purposeful activities, drugs, and gangs as factors contributing to inter-prisoner violence and requested States parties to address these factors.¹⁰⁰ In order to prevent violence in prisons, including suicides, the Committee has suggested to increase the number of staff, including those with training in the management of inter-prisoner violence, as well as to install video cameras.¹⁰¹

38 The Committee has also called upon States parties to establish confidential systems for complaints, including complaints about sexual violence that are available in all places of detention.¹⁰² Cases of inter-prisoner violence are to be thoroughly investigated and perpetrators punished.¹⁰³ Victims of inter-prisoner violence or their families should be in a position to receive compensation.¹⁰⁴

39 The UNSRT has emphasized the importance of trainings in order to sensitize prison staff about how important it is to take effective steps to prevent and remedy inter-prisoner violence and provide them with the necessary competences to do so.¹⁰⁵

40 Certain detainees, such as members of particular racial, ethnic, or national groups; lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, and intersex people, and persons convicted or suspected of sexual crimes may be at a higher risk of violence and abuse from other prisoners and thus the State may have to afford specific safeguards. States parties should also take measures to eradicate any form of discrimination against detainees.¹⁰⁶ This issue is addressed in the section below.

3.4.4 Ensuring Protection against Ill-Treatment in Detention for Groups in a Specific Situation of Vulnerability

41 As Article 16 contains a general obligation of prevention this also obliges States to put into place safeguards against ill-treatment. The procedural safeguards required at arrest, during interrogation, and detention are the same as required by the obligation to prevent torture (Article 2) as it is largely overlapping and congruent with the obligation to prevent other forms of ill-treatment.¹⁰⁷ Article 16 makes particular mention of Articles 11, 12, and 13 as specific preventive obligations. Therefore reference is made to Article 11 in regard to procedural safeguards and to Articles 12 and 13 in regard to the right to complain and the State duty to investigate cases of ill-treatment.¹⁰⁸

42 The obligation of States to provide safeguards also means that unofficial places of detention are a 'complete negation'¹⁰⁹ of the guarantees against the deprivation of liberty and thus per se a breach of the Convention.¹¹⁰

43 Particular measures must be taken to protect persons in a situation of vulnerability. The Committee states that

[t]he protection of certain minority or marginalized individuals or populations especially at risk of torture is a part of the obligation to prevent torture or ill-treatment' and that States must ensure that their laws implementing the CAT 'are in practice applied to all persons, regardless of race, colour, ethnicity, age, religious belief or affiliation, political or other opinion, national or social origin, gender, sexual orientation, transgender identity, mental or other disability, health status, economic or indigenous status, reason for which the person is detained, including persons accused of political offences or terrorist acts, asylum-seekers, refugees or others under international protection, or any other status or adverse distinction.¹¹¹

For that purpose the Committee has urged State parties to increase their efforts to combat discrimination of persons in a situation of vulnerability¹¹² and to separate detainees for their protection taking account of their sex, age, criminal record, the legal reason for their detention as well as the necessities of their treatment,¹¹³ particularly juveniles from adults, pre-trial detainees from convicted prisoners and women from men.¹¹⁴

44 The Committee expressed specific concern over the conditions of *children*¹¹⁵ in detention, in particular when they are not segregated from adults and when sentenced to life imprisonment.¹¹⁶ The CRC specifically prohibits torture and ill-treatment and stipulates that deprivation of liberty shall be used only as a measure of last resort and for the shortest appropriate time and in a manner which takes into account the needs of persons of his or her age (Article 37). In this regard, guidance can be found in the UN Rules for the Protection of Juveniles Deprived of their Liberty (Havana Rules).¹¹⁷ In line with the CRC, the Committee has repeatedly asked States parties that children in conflict with the law should only receive a prison sentence as a last resort.¹¹⁸ The Committee has also recommended that States have to make sure that their juvenile justice system is in compliance with the UN Standard Minimum Rules for the Administration of Juvenile Justice (Beijing Rules).¹¹⁹

45 The Committee has expressed concern at children being imprisoned with their mothers and has recommended increasing the use of non-custodial measures.¹²⁰ If detention is unavoidable, States have to ensure that conditions are in accordance with the UN Rules for the Treatment of Women prisoners and Non-custodial Measures for Women Offenders (Bangkok Rules).

46 The UNSRT has emphasized that regardless of the conditions in which children are held, ‘detention has a profound and negative impact on child health and development’,¹²¹ with even short periods of detention having the potential to negatively impact cognitive development.

47 Despite the existing standards, detention of children under inhuman conditions remains a serious problem worldwide with immeasurable consequences on their development and the society at large. Therefore the UN Secretary-General has commissioned an in-depth Global Study on children deprived of liberty, lead by the Independent Expert Manfred Nowak, to examine the scope, reasons, and alternatives to detention of children to be submitted to the General Assembly in 2019.¹²²

48 Despite the fact that the number of elderly detainees is steadily rising, which leads to questions on how to deal with health issues like dementia, chronic diseases, and other geriatric conditions,¹²³ the Committee does not seem to have expressed itself on these kind of issues yet.

49 Women face specific risks to be subjected to ill-treatment in detention. The Committee and the UNSRT have specifically noted their concern regarding sexual violence and assault, including rape, insults, humiliation, and unnecessary invasive body searches, especially when women are not separated from male detainees or male staff are responsible for their care.¹²⁴ Women have specific needs when deprived of liberty which are addressed in detail in the UN Rules for the Treatment of Women Prisoners and Non-custodial Measures for Women Offenders (Bangkok Rules)¹²⁵ complementing the Mandela Rules.¹²⁶ According to the UNSRT, the risk of torture or ill-treatment against women deprived of their liberty would significantly decrease if these standards were implemented and he thus calls on States to create regulations and trainings, as well as to further monitor the situation.¹²⁷

50 The Committee has stated that gender is a key factor in the prevention of torture and other forms of ill-treatment emphasizing that also men are ‘subject to certain gendered violations . . . on the basis of their actual or perceived non-conformity with socially determined gender roles’.¹²⁸ Moreover, lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, and intersex (LGBTI) persons run a particular risk of ill-treatment in detention. Both the Committee and Subcommittee have emphasized the risk of ill-treatment of LGBTI persons deprived of liberty in prison, in healthcare facilities, or in immigration detention.¹²⁹ The Subcommittee stated that authorities ‘must recognize specific risks, identify those who are in a vulnerable situation and protect them in ways that do not leave them isolated’ and criticized the lack of institutional policies and methods to adequately address self-identification, classification, risk assessment, and placement.¹³⁰ The Yogyakarta Principles provide guidance on measures to protect LGBTI persons against discrimination and abuse in detention.¹³¹

51 Pre-trial detainees do not only face the highest risk to be tortured but also to be subjected to particularly poor detention conditions amounting to ill-treatment.¹³² The Committee has repeatedly expressed concern about prolonged pre-trial detention.¹³³ It found that long periods of pre-trial detention and delays in judicial procedure, together with the overcrowding in prisons resulting in convicted prisoners and prisoners awaiting trial being held in police stations and other places of detention not adequately equipped for long periods of detention, could in themselves constitute a violation of Article 16 CAT.¹³⁴

52 The Committee has expressed its concern that widespread use of pre-trial detention might undermine the right to presumption of innocence¹³⁵ and has reiterated that States parties should step up non-custodial measures through the application of alternative measures to imprisonment, such as probation, bail, mediation, community service, and suspended sentences and in line with the UN Standard Minimum Rules for Non-custodial Measures (Tokyo Rules)¹³⁶ and the Bangkok Rules.¹³⁷ States should for example amend their legislation and only impose pre-trial detention as a measure of last resort and for a limited period, as well as to make sure that alternatives to detention are effectively applied by the judiciary.¹³⁸

53 The Committee has expressed its concern at the poor conditions and inadequate treatment of persons with mental or physical disabilities, especially forceful internment and long-term restraints used in social care institutions and psychiatric hospitals that amount to torture or other forms of ill-treatment.¹³⁹ According to the Committee, involuntary deprivation of liberty should only be undertaken on the basis of a legal decision, effectively guaranteeing periodic judicial review as well as all legal safeguards.¹⁴⁰ It recommended community based alternatives in order to proceed with de-institutionalization.¹⁴¹ States parties should also ensure independent oversight of institutions and frequent monitoring by NHRIs and CSOs.¹⁴² It has stipulated that States parties shall make sure that the right of institutionalized persons to mental and physical integrity, especially in case of restraint measures or enforced treatments such as neuroleptic drugs, is ensured.¹⁴³ Means of physical or chemical restraint should be avoided or used as a last resort only, when all other alternatives have failed, never as a punishment, for the shortest duration possible, under strict medical supervision, and should be recorded in registers that are subject to independent monitoring.¹⁴⁴ Moreover, the Committee recommended increasing the number of medical staff and rehabilitation activities in forensic psychiatric hospitals.¹⁴⁵

54 Migrants and refugees tend to be criminalized upon interception or rescue and held in substandard and overcrowded conditions amounting to torture or ill-treatment.¹⁴⁶ The Committee held that the detention of asylum seekers, as well as other migrants should only be used as a last resort, when strictly necessary, and if it is applied, duration shall be as short as possible, as well as proportionate to each individual's case.¹⁴⁷ Mandatory deprivation of liberty for persons entering the territory of the State party should be repealed and at the same time ensured, that persons are not held indefinitely, eg in case of stateless persons receiving a negative decision in their asylum proceeding or persons with 'adverse security or character assessments'.¹⁴⁸ States parties should also ensure that alternatives to detention are made use of when feasible, medical check-up upon arrival is guaranteed, and psychological follow-up examinations by a specifically trained independent health expert in case of signs of torture or traumatisation are provided.¹⁴⁹

There need to be statutory time limits for the detention, and if a person is detained, he/she needs to have access to an effective judicial remedy and must be in a position to challenge administrative decisions regarding the person's detention, expulsion or refoulement.¹⁵⁰ In AA v Denmark, where the detention lasted less than three months, with regular judicial reviews and psychiatric examination and medication, the Committee did not find a violation of Article 2 and 16 of the Convention.¹⁵¹

3.5 Preventing Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Punishments

55 The Committee and other human rights monitoring bodies have dealt extensively and controversially with the issue of corporal and capital punishment. While these are still applied to this day by the State or with its acquiescence, the view of human rights mechanisms on such forms of punishment has developed significantly over the last decades. Other punishments which the Committee has criticized as possibly constituting violations of Article 16, include life imprisonment for children,¹⁵² and for certain crimes;¹⁵³ hard labour;¹⁵⁴ internal exile and confinement at home;¹⁵⁵ solitary confinement as a punishment;¹⁵⁶ ‘chain gangs’, electro-shock stun belts, and restraint chairs if used as punishments¹⁵⁷ (if used as methods of restraint see section 3.4.2). The lawful sanctions clause in Article 1, paragraph 2 cannot be understood to legitimize forms of punishment that are cruel, inhuman or degrading.¹⁵⁸

3.5.1 Corporal Punishment

56 There are two forms of corporal punishments: administrative and judicial.¹⁵⁹ Judicial corporal punishments are imposed by courts in a sentence after conviction; administrative corporal punishments are disciplinary measures, eg in prisons or schools.

57 In 1978, the ECtHR had ruled that birching of a juvenile as a traditional punishment on the Isle of Man was no longer compatible with the prohibition of degrading punishment in Article 3 ECHR.¹⁶⁰ Shortly thereafter the HRC, in a General Comment of 1982, expressed the unanimous opinion that the prohibition of Article 7 CCPR ‘must extend to corporal punishment, including excessive chastisement as an educational or disciplinary measure’ which was confirmed in the revised General Comment of 1992.¹⁶¹ But it was only in 2000 that the HRC confirmed this opinion in an individual case. In the landmark decision of Osbourne v Jamaica, which concerned the judicial sentence of ten strokes with the tamarind switch on the naked buttocks in the presence of twenty-five prison warders, it took a very clear and unanimous position:¹⁶² ‘Irrespective of the nature of the crime that is to be punished, however brutal it may be, it is the firm opinion of the Committee that corporal punishment constitutes cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment or punishment contrary to article 7 of the Covenant'. This case law has been reaffirmed in later decisions.¹⁶³

58 The Committee against Torture had a more difficult task since Islamic and other States took the position that corporal punishment was covered under the lawful sanctions clause in Article 1 and, therefore, could not be considered as a violation of Article 16.¹⁶⁴ Other Governments, in the State reporting procedure, reported under Article 16 about their efforts to reduce and eradicate corporal punishment. The Canadian representative referred in 1993 to a statement by the Supreme Court that certain punishments, such as corporal punishment, will always offend the protection against cruel and unusual punishment. Canada was also re-examining a provision in the Criminal Code which permitted reasonable force by a parent or school teacher in the correction of a child.¹⁶⁵ Similarly, Sweden in the same year informed the Committee in relation to Article 16 that under its domestic law the use of corporal punishment against children was prohibited.¹⁶⁶

59 These legal opinions of Governments encouraged the Committee, which in the early years was very hesitant to take up corporal punishment, to take a firmer stand.¹⁶⁷ During the discussion of the Jordanian report in 1995, the Committee expressed concern that the continuing application of capital and corporal punishment 'could constitute in itself a violation in terms of CAT' and recommended that the Government review its policy relating to corporal punishment.¹⁶⁸ Similarly, in 1997 the Committee recommended to Namibia the 'prompt abolition of corporal punishment insofar as it is legally still possible under the Prisons Act of 1959 and the Criminal Procedure Act of 1977'.¹⁶⁹ In respect of Libya in 1999, the Committee noted with satisfaction that corporal punishment had not been used in recent years, but stressed nevertheless that it should be abolished by law.¹⁷⁰ In 2005 the Committee welcomed the abolition of corporal punishment in Uganda following the 1999 judgment of the Supreme Court in Kyamanywa v Uganda.¹⁷¹

60 The clearest conclusion that corporal punishment was not in conformity with the Convention was reached when the Committee discussed the reports of Saudi Arabia, Yemen, and Qatar in the early 2000s; a conclusion that was only recently re-confirmed.¹⁷² With respect to Saudi Arabia, in 2002 the Committee considered the imposition of corporal punishments (including in particular flogging and amputation of limbs) to be in breach of the Convention and recommended that the State party re-examine it. Such recommendation was reiterated in 2016, when it recommended to stop immediately the practices of flogging/lashing, amputation of limbs, and any other form of corporal punishment and prohibit their use by law, as they amount to torture and ill-treatment and constitute a violation of the Convention.¹⁷³ While noting the State party's indication that Shari'a expressly prohibits torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment, the Committee drew attention to the fact that domestic law itself does not explicitly reflect this prohibition, nor does it impose criminal sanctions.¹⁷⁴

61 Successive UN Special Rapporteurs on Torture have also addressed the question of corporal punishment in their reports.¹⁷⁵ UNSRT Nowak stated in his 2009 report, that corporal punishment as a form of ill-treatment remains widespread.¹⁷⁶ In his 2005 report to the General Assembly, he concluded, on the basis of a review of jurisprudence of international and regional human rights mechanisms, that 'any form of corporal punishment is contrary to the prohibition of torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. Moreover, States cannot invoke provisions of domestic law to justify the violation of their human rights obligations under international law, including the prohibition of corporal punishment'¹⁷⁷ and called upon States to abolish all forms corporal punishment without delay.¹⁷⁸

62 The prohibition of corporal punishment also extends to administrative punishment and disciplinary measures outside of any criminal or other judicial process. This is explicitly stated for places of detention in the Mandela Rules and regional soft law standards.¹⁷⁹ Also regarding the use of corporal punishment in schools and other welfare institutions for children the Committee has expressed its concern and urged to implement legislation banning such practices and to establish competent monitoring mechanisms for such facilities.¹⁸⁰ The Human Rights Committee¹⁸¹ and the Committee on the Rights of the Child¹⁸² have equally argued that the use of corporal punishment is a violation of the respective Conventions.

63 This also extends to corporal punishment by private actors if committed with the consent and acquiescence of the State. The Committee expressed its concern where some forms of corporal punishment are still allowed by law in the home by parents or in loco parentis (ie in the legal responsibility of a person or organization taking over the functions and responsibilities of a parent), or are not specifically prohibited by law.¹⁸³ The Committee recommended introducing an explicit prohibition of corporal punishment in all settings and to implement awareness-raising campaigns addressing the harmful effects of corporal punishment.¹⁸⁴

64 The UN Global Study on violence against children also highlighted that violence against children may lead to 'greater susceptibility to lifelong social, emotional, and cognitive impairments and to health-risk behaviours',¹⁸⁵ and health and social problems for the children themselves, but there are also significant economic costs to society.¹⁸⁶

65 One can, therefore, conclude that corporal punishment, as a judicial or disciplinary sanction, committed by the State or with its acquiescence is nowadays considered a form of ill-treatment prohibited by international law confirmed by the Committee against Torture, the Human Rights Committee, the Committee on the Rights of the Child, and the UN Special Rapporteur on Torture, as well as regional human rights mechanisms such as the Inter-American Court of Human Rights,¹⁸⁷ the European Court of Human Rights, and European Committee of Social Rights.¹⁸⁸ The lawful sanctions clause in Article 1 CAT cannot be invoked as a legal justification for corporal punishment. States that practise corporal punishment as a judicial or disciplinary measure or that do not take effective measures to prohibit and prevent it in the private sphere thus violate the prohibition of ill-treatment.¹⁸⁹

3.5.2 Capital Punishment

66 More difficult to answer is the question whether capital punishment per se violates Article 16 CAT because the right to life in Article 6 CCPR, Article 2 ECHR, and Article 4 ACHR explicitly permits the death penalty under certain circumstances. In a well-reasoned landmark judgment of 1995, the South African Constitutional Court considered capital punishment in any case as a cruel, inhuman, and degrading punishment.¹⁹⁰ Similarly, in the 1989 judgment in Soering v the United Kingdom,¹⁹¹ the ECtHR

¹⁸⁸ In 2003, the European Committee of Social Rights found a violation of three collective complaints, alleging that the States concerned had not effectively prohibited all corporal punishment of children as provided for under Art. 17 of the European Social Charter. In OMCT v Greece (collective complaint No 17/2003) the ECSR found that corporal punishment was not adequately prohibited in the home, in secondary schools and in institutions caring for children, and that even if violence against the person is punished under criminal law provisions and subject to increased penalties where the victim is a child, this does not constitute sufficient prohibition to comply with Art.17(1) of the revised Charter; in OMCT v Belgium (collective complaint No 21/2003) it found that the law did not adequately prohibit corporal punishment by parents and 'other persons', including for education purposes; and in OMCT v Ireland (collective complaint No 18/2003) it noted in the decision that the corporal punishment of children within the home is permitted in Ireland by virtue of the existence of the common law defence of reasonable chastisement. Under the procedure based on reports, a number of States have been found in violation of Art. 17 of the Charter on grounds that the corporal punishment of children is not adequately prohibited (Belgium, Czech Republic, Estonia, France, Germany, Hungary, Lithuania, Malta, Moldova, the Netherlands, Poland, Romania, the United Kingdom, Slovakia, Slovenia, Spain and Turkey). found the death row phenomenon in Virginia to constitute inhuman and degrading punishment. In the case of Öcalan v Turkey the Court concluded that it would be contrary to the ECHR to implement a death sentence following an unfair trial, but finally left open the question of whether the death penalty per se violates Article 3.¹⁹² In Al-Saadoon and Mufdhi v the UK, the Court found that the judicial execution involves the 'deliberate and premeditated destruction of a human being by the State authorities. Whatever the method of execution, the extinction of life involves some physical pain. In addition, the foreknowledge of death at the hands of the State must inevitably give rise to intense psychological suffering.'¹⁹³ The Court found a violation of Article 3 due to the mental suffering the applicants have been subjected to because of their fear of execution, amounting to inhuman treatment within the meaning of Article 3.¹⁹⁴

67 Thus, the ECtHR is the first international human rights court which clearly states that capital punishment is nothing but an aggravated form of corporal punishment and therefore, in any case, constitutes a cruel and inhuman punishment in violation of the right to dignity. On the other hand, the UN treaty bodies are still struggling with this issue.

68 The HRC found itself in highly intractable debates on various issues in relation to its legal qualification of capital punishment, cautiously taking a more critical stance in recent years.¹⁹⁵

In a General Comment of 1992, the HRC argued that the death penalty must be carried out 'in such a way as to cause the least possible physical and mental suffering'.¹⁹⁶ As such, it has found public executions a degrading form of punishment in violation of articles 6 and 7 ICCPR,¹⁹⁷ and the use of execution methods such as stoning,¹⁹⁸ injection of untested lethal drugs,¹⁹⁹ firing squad, gas chambers,²⁰⁰ burning and burying alive,²⁰¹ and decapitation to be cruel, degrading, and inhuman and thus contrary to Articles 7 and 6, paragraphs 1 and 2 of the ICCPR. It also explained that failure to provide individuals who await the application of the death penalty with timely information about the execution date is ill-treatment, which makes the subsequent execution incompatible with Articles 6 and 7 of the Covenant.²⁰² However, in its draft General Comment No 36 on Article 6, the HRC points out that an increasing number of ratifications of the Second Optional Protocol and other international instruments, as well as changing State practice 'suggest that considerable progress may have been made towards establishing an agreement among the States parties to consider the death penalty as a cruel, inhuman or degrading form of punishment'²⁰³ and that 'such a legal development ought to be welcomed as it is consistent with the pro-abolitionist spirit of the Covenant, which manifests itself, inter alia, in the texts of article 6, paragraph 6 and the Second Optional Protocol.²⁰⁴

69 The Committee against Torture has similar problems in arriving at a clear position regarding capital punishment.²⁰⁵ Some individual members have suggested repeatedly that the death penalty per se constituted cruel, inhuman or degrading punishment in violation of Article 16 CAT²⁰⁶ and expressed concern that the continued application of the death penalty could 'in itself constitute a violation of the terms of the Convention'.²⁰⁷ But this opinion has not become the general practice of the Committee. While it recommended the abolition of the death penalty and found the extension of the death penalty to new crimes to be violating international law, it focused otherwise mainly on the procedures and methods of execution.²⁰⁸ The Committee observed that public hanging as a method of execution could be regarded as cruel and degrading punishment²⁰⁹ and asked to carefully review execution methods, in particular lethal injection, in order to prevent severe pain and suffering.²¹⁰ Also the conditions of detention of death row inmates may amount to ill-treatment according to the Committee, particularly due to the excessive length of time on death row.²¹¹ It was emphasized that 'where capital punishment occurs, it shall be carried out as to inflict the minimum possible suffering'.²¹²

70 The Committee also expressed concerns about 'inadequate' *procedures leading to the death penalty*²¹³ or delayed procedures for appeals that keep prisoners sentenced to death in a situation of incertitude and anguish for many years that may amount to torture or ill-treatment.²¹⁴ Thus, it recommended specific safeguards for death row inmates including: giving reasonable advance notice to detainees and their families about their scheduled time of execution, revising the rule of solitary confinement for death row prisoners, ensuring these detainees are guaranteed effective legal assistance at all stages of the proceedings, including confidential meetings with their lawyers, provide the possibility of pardon, commutation and reprieve, as well as the introduction of a mandatory system of review following a death penalty convicting at first instance.²¹⁵ Finally, the Committee underlined that there should be an independent review of every case, when there is evidence that a detainee on death row is mentally ill. The Committee confirmed that it shall be ensured that mentally ill detainees are not executed.²¹⁶ The Committee has moreover underlined that if the death penalty is imposed, this is only done for the most serious crimes and in compliance with international norms.²¹⁷

71 The UNSRT has been more outspoken than the UN treaty bodies in the interpretation of the death penalty noting that human rights are a rapidly developing concept and thus the interpretation of what constitutes torture or other forms of ill-treatment may change over time.²¹⁸ While recognizing that international bodies have not per se held the death penalty as a violation of the absolute prohibition of torture and ill-treatment, there is a clear trend in this direction at the regional and national levels, based on practice by States and judiciaries.²¹⁹ The UNSRT stipulated that, in practice, executions often violate the absolute prohibition of torture and ill-treatment 'either because of the death row phenomenon or because the method applied involves unnecessary suffering and indignity'.²²⁰ Emphasizing that some methods of executions (such as stoning or gas asphyxiation) already is 'clearly prohibited under international law' there is no 'categorical evidence' that any method of conducting the death penalty exists that actually complies with the absolute prohibition of torture and ill-treatment.²²¹ Also the death row phenomenon can be a violation of Article 7 ICCPR and of Article 1 or Article 16 of the CAT, depending on the severity of conditions and the length of isolation.²²² Referring to regional and domestic jurisprudence²²³ the UNSRT also concludes that 'the mandatory death penalty, a legal regime under which judges have no discretion to consider aggravating or mitigating circumstances with respect to the crime or the offender, violates due process and constitutes inhumane treatment.'²²⁴ While much speaks for capital punishment generally constituting an act of ill-treatment, it is 'inherently cruel' in the case for the execution of pregnant women, nursing mothers, elderly persons and persons with mental disabilities.²²⁵ State practice has also lead to a ius cogens norm regarding the prohibition of the execution of juveniles.²²⁶

72 It can therefore be concluded that a dynamic interpretation of the terms 'cruel, inhuman and degrading punishment' in Articles 16 CAT and 7 ICCPR, as applied in respect to corporal punishment, outweighs the argument for the need for a systematic interpretation between the right to life and the right to personal integrity and dignity.²²⁷ It is not unreasonable to argue that the death penalty, although not constituting a violation of the right to life in those countries that are not parties to the second OP to the ICCPR, nevertheless must be considered an inhuman and degrading punishment according to the present understanding of these terms. It seems to be a more consistent interpretation of these different provisions than arriving at the conclusion that capital punishment is less inhuman and degrading than six strokes with the tamarind switch. After all, capital punishment is an aggravated form of corporal punishment. In addition, the death penalty is not the only exception to the right to life, whereas the prohibition of torture, cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment and punishment, which are practices that are considered as most direct attacks on the core of human dignity, have been laid down as one of the few absolute human rights in international treaty law. Although both the Human Rights Committee and the Committee against Torture are still divided on this issue, a systematic interpretation of both the ICCPR and the CAT, in light of the present day circumstances and the legal trend towards abolition of the death penalty, leads to the conclusion that Article 16 CAT prohibits not only corporal but also capital punishment.

3.6 Extra-Custodial Use of Force and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

73 It has been argued that in view of the history of the Convention, the victims of acts referred to in Article 16 ‘must be understood as consisting of persons who are deprived of their liberty or who are otherwise under the factual power or control of the person responsible for the treatment or punishment’.²²⁸ This interpretation would exclude excessive use of police force outside detention and similar factual control from the scope of application of the Convention. However, the travaux préparatoires show that detention and similar direct control was meant only to constitute a precondition for the qualification of torture, as defined in Article 1.²²⁹ The Committee has also followed this interpretation and considered excessive use of force in routine police operations or dissolving riots or demonstrations as a violation of Article 16.²³⁰

74 Also the UNSRT has repeatedly confirmed that the prohibition of torture and other forms of ill-treatment is not restricted to conduct against persons deprived of liberty, but also covers conduct of law enforcement agencies, eg excessive police violence, as well as torture and other forms of ill-treatment by acquiescence, ie non-State actors committing torture and other forms of ill-treatment and States not adhering to their due diligence obligation to prevent such acts.²³¹

75 Since the police are entitled to use physical force and arms for lawful purposes, the principle of proportionality must be applied in order to determine whether the use of force is excessive or not. Only such use of force, which results in severe pain or suffering and which, in the particular circumstances of a given case, is considered to be excessive and non-proportional in relation to the purpose to be achieved amounts to inhuman or cruel treatment or punishment. The use of force by State agents is only legitimate if it complies with several cumulative principles. It needs to have a legal basis (legality), it can only be applied when strictly necessary (necessity), it should not be excessive (proportionality).²³² Finally, it is also essential to highlight the principle of precaution, meaning that law enforcement operations shall be organized beforehand in a way to avoid an excessive use of force to minimize possible harms. If force is used in a particularly humiliating manner, it may be qualified as degrading treatment even if less severe pain or suffering is thereby inflicted.

76 The Committee has found a violation of Article 16 in the case of Fatou Sonko v Spain, which concerned the death of a migrant after he had been intercepted on the sea by Spanish border guards, trying to enter Spanish territory. The complainant, the sister of Mr. Sonko, argued that the Spanish border guards made Mr. Sonko and other intercepted persons jump into the water after they had actually been brought onto their vessel and after they had punched their dinghies—something that the Spanish authorities contested. The Committee concluded that while the exact course of events remained unclear, he had in any case been put in a situation that caused his death.²³³ The Committee determined that Mr. Sonko had been subjected to physical and mental suffering prior to his death, which, though not amounting to torture, it constituted ill-treatment under Article 16. In doing so, the Committee considered that physical and mental suffering experienced by the victim had been aggravated by this particular vulnerability as a migrant.²³⁴

77 Another important example is the case Diory Barry (or Diodory Barry) v Morocco where border guards pushed migrants back into the sea and the expulsion of a group of migrants from Morocco to Mauretania.²³⁵ According to the complainants, 40 undocumented migrants, some severely injured, were left in the border area between Morocco and Mauretania with only minimal food and water supplies and were forced to walk 50 km through an area containing anti-personnel mines in order to reach an inhabited area on the Mauritanian side. The Committee found these circumstances of expulsion an infliction of severe physical and mental suffering by public officials and qualified it as cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment as defined by Article 16.²³⁶

78 The Committee expressed specific concern about the excessive use of force during *demonstrations and public assemblies*²³⁷ including the use of dogs²³⁸, plastic bullet rounds,²³⁹ pepper spray²⁴⁰ or even firearms²⁴¹ for the purposes of crowd control. It needs to be recalled that individual protection against ill-treatment shall be granted even when assemblies are unlawful or violent.²⁴² With regard to assemblies, the UNSRT has emphasised, that individuals cannot lose their protection against torture and other forms of ill-treatment ‘under any circumstances whatsoever, including in the context of violent riots or unlawful protests’.²⁴³

79 The Committee also dealt with the problem of extra-custodial use of weapons, which can amount to torture or other forms of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment if employed unnecessarily or in an excessive manner.²⁴⁴ Clearly the use of firearms carries an inherent risk of causing unnecessary suffering and injury. The Committee recommended that there should be a clear and unambiguous message to all levels of the police as well as to prison staff that torture, ill-treatment and violence are not acceptable.²⁴⁵ To this end, States should introduce a code of conduct and police disciplinary regulations in line with international instruments,²⁴⁶ rules of engagement fully in accordance with the Convention and other international standards²⁴⁷, SOPs and a monitoring system to adhere to these.²⁴⁸ States should train all of its law enforcement personnel in the proper use of force and should regulate the use of firearms by its security forces in line with the Basic Principles on the Use of Force and Firearms by Law Enforcement Officials and to integrate provisions of these international instruments in the police disciplinary regulation.²⁴⁹

80 The use of alternatives to firearms, so called less-lethal weapons (such as certain types of kinetic impact projectiles, electrical discharge weapons, chemical irritants, water cannons and disorientation devices) is increasing and can minimize harm. At the same time, a widespread availability may result in an overuse with indiscriminate effects that runs counter to the principles of necessity and proportionality.²⁵⁰ The Committee has expressed in various occasions its concern over the use of electrical discharge weapons delivering electric shocks (eg tasers) as a weapon involving a high risk of ill-treatment, not only causing severe pain but also death. It asked States parties to consider relinquishing the use of tasers, to revise the regulations involving its use and prohibit their use on children and pregnant women.²⁵¹ Further, the Committee has recommended that tasers should only be used by trained and certified staff, only in extremely limited situations, in case of a real and immediate threat to life or risk of serious injury, strictly as a substitute for lethal weapons.²⁵²

81 The Committee has expressed specific concern about reports of brutality and extra-custodial use of excessive force by law enforcement officials against groups in situations of vulnerability, in particular racial minorities, migrants and persons of different sexual orientation which have not been adequately investigated.²⁵³ Furthermore, the Committee has underlined that no one should be detained on the basis of social status, but States parties are to find human alternatives for vulnerable groups, as well as provide them with the required assistance.²⁵⁴ When private actors or groups commit violence against persons or specific groups, the State will have to protect the persons subjected to these forms of ill-treatment.²⁵⁵

82 The prohibition of excessive use of force applies also to the military. In its conclusions on the report of the Ukraine in 1997, the Committee considered the systematic mistreatment and beatings of recruits in the armed forces as a flagrant violation of Article 16.²⁵⁶ The Committee and the UNSRT have also called States parties to take effective measures to eradicate hazing in the armed forces, ensure prompt, impartial and effective investigations and prosecution of such abuse and report publicly on the results.²⁵⁷ Appropriate punishment of the perpetrators, including the exclusion from the armed forces and redress for the victims should be ensured.²⁵⁸

3.7 Prevention of Ill-Treatment Committed By Private Actors

83 Cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment can also be committed by public officials by acquiescence, as confirmed by the Committee in the Dzemajl et al v Yugoslavia.²⁵⁹ The case was submitted by 65 persons of Romani origin, whose settlement was burned down, looted and demolished with the knowledge and partly in the presence of the local police and without the police preventing its occurrence or investigating the incident further. The applicants claimed that Yugoslavia had violated Articles 1, 2, 12, 13, 14 and 16 CAT. The Committee did not consider the complaint under Articles 1 and 2 but failed to give any reasons for this. It simply found that the burning and destruction of houses, in the circumstances constitute cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. The Committee also underlined the particular vulnerability of the victims and the fact that there was a racial motivation behind the violence against the Roma inhabitants of the settlement and that even though these acts were not committed by public officials, ‘the Committee considers that they were committed with their acquiescence and constitute therefore a violation of article 16, paragraph 1, of the Convention by the State party.’

84 In the State reporting procedure the Committee has emphasized that the protection of minority and marginalized individuals and groups who are especially at risk of torture is an important part of the State’s obligation to prevent torture or other forms of ill-treatment.²⁶⁰ It has expressed its serious concern regarding a number of States parties about harassment, violent attacks, as well as hate crimes based on discrimination regarding members of certain racial and ethnic groups, immigrants or LGBTI individuals or socially marginalized groups, such as sex workers, victims of trafficking, drug users, migrant workers, homeless persons, beggars, street children and mentally ill persons.²⁶¹

85 The Committee stated that States parties should take effective measures to protect people at risk by establishing a comprehensive legal framework to combat discrimination, including hate crimes, hate speech and promoting and inciting violence because of discrimination.²⁶² States should also make sure to effectively enforce anti-discrimination legislation.²⁶³

86 Protective measures against attacks should be put into place and States parties should ensure that effective policing and that functional complaints mechanisms are in place, as well as that any allegations of attacks against persons, discrimination and hate speech are systematically and promptly, thoroughly and impartially investigated.²⁶⁴ Offenses carried out motivated by discrimination should constitute an aggravating circumstance in the criminal prosecution process.²⁶⁵ Perpetrators are to be brought to justice and punished accordingly and victims should receive redress in line with the Convention.²⁶⁶ Stereotypes and discrimination should be eradicated through training for law enforcement officials on combating crime against minorities, awareness-raising, information campaigns and attacks against minorities should be publicly condemned.²⁶⁷ Members of minorities, eg Roma, should be recruited for law enforcement agencies.²⁶⁸

87 The Committee has also emphasized repeatedly that States parties have to ensure that human rights defenders, journalists and NGOs can undertake their work and need to be protected from violence, threats, killings and intimidation as a result of their activities, with any violence needing to be investigated effectively and punished appropriately.²⁶⁹

88 The Committee has expressed concerns about the persistence of harmful practices such as female genital mutilation. It urged states to go beyond its criminalization and take the necessary steps to eradicate the practice, including through nationwide awareness-raising campaigns for both women and men, offering alternative sources of income to those earning their living by performing FGM and other harmful traditional practices and to punish the perpetrators of such acts.²⁷⁰ Also the UNSRT expressed concern regarding harmful practices committed by non-State actors such as female genital mutilation, domestic violence and human trafficking that can amount to torture or other forms of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment.²⁷¹

3.8 Savings Clause (Paragraph 2)

89 As stated in Article 1(2), Article 16(2) also contains a savings clause to the effect that the provisions of Article 16(1) 'are without prejudice to the provisions of any other international instrument or national law which prohibits cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment or which relates to extradition or expulsion'. For the interpretation of this savings clause, reference should be made to the commentary on Article 1(2).²⁷² Article 1(2) expressly stipulates that Article 1 has no effect on international instruments and national legislation with provisions having a wider scope. Similarly, Article 16(2) stipulates the same in respect of other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment.

90 Article 16(2) makes it clear that any wider protection mechanism relating to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment in national or international law is not affected by the provisions of the Convention. Accordingly, in so far as other international instruments or national laws provide better protection to individuals, they are entitled to benefit from it; however, other international instruments or national law can never restrict the protection which the individual enjoys under the Convention. A typical example of the application of the savings clause in Article 16(2) is the non-refoulement principle derived from Article 3 ECHR and Article 7 CCPR, which, according to the jurisprudence of the relevant treaty bodies, applies not only to the danger of being subjected to torture (as in Article 3 CAT), but also to the danger of being subjected to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment.²⁷³

91 In the third periodic report of Canada, the interpretation of Article 16(2) was discussed. The Committee noted with concern Canada's policy that compelling security interests could be invoked to justify the removal of aliens to countries where they might face a substantial risk of torture or ill-treatment. Article 3 CAT had not been incorporated in domestic legislation and consequently recognized refugees could be returned if they were considered a danger to the public or had committed acts that were contrary to Canada's national security interests. The Committee did not consider that such exceptions to the non-refoulement principle were appropriate or admissible. The Committee further noted that Article 3(1) CAT had been challenged by the Federal Court of Appeal on the grounds that the prohibition of refoulement was a derogable right. In this case, the Court also interpreted Article 16(2) as meaning that the exceptions to the prohibition of refoulement in the case of alleged threats to national security provided for in Article 33(2) of the Convention relating to the Status of Refugees were applicable. The Committee noted, however, that Article 16 concerned cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, whereas Article 3 concerned torture. Accordingly it was submitted that the two provisions should be viewed as complementary rather than contradictory and the Canadian delegation was asked by the country rapporteur, Ms Gaer, to explain why its Government relied on an interpretation that would lower standards and diminish the victim's protection.²⁷⁴

92 Regarding the savings clause in Article 16(2), the Committee also refuted the argument of the United States that the Convention was not applicable in times and in the context of armed conflict on the basis of the argument that the 'law of armed conflict' was the exclusive lex specialis applicable, and that the Convention's application 'would result in an overlap of the different treaties which would undermine the objective of eradicating torture'. The Committee concluded that the United States should recognize and ensure that the Convention applies at all times, whether in peace, war or armed conflict, in any territory under its jurisdiction and that the application of the Convention's provisions are without prejudice to the provisions of any other international instrument, pursuant to paragraph 2 of its Articles 1 and 16.²⁷⁵ The Committee also emphasized in its General Comment that the prohibition of ill-treatment is non-derogable 'and its prevention to be an effective and non-derogable measure'.²⁷⁶

PART II
PROCEDURAL ARTICLES

Article 17

Committee against Torture

1. There shall be established a Committee against Torture (hereinafter referred to as the Committee) which shall carry out the functions hereinafter provided. The Committee shall consist of ten experts of high moral standing and recognized competence in the field of human rights, who shall serve in their personal capacity. The experts shall be elected by the States Parties, consideration being given to equitable geographical distribution and to the usefulness of the participation of some persons having legal experience.
2. The members of the Committee shall be elected by secret ballot from a list of persons nominated by States Parties. Each State Party may nominate one person from among its own nationals. States Parties shall bear in mind the usefulness of nominating persons who are also members of the Human Rights Committee established under the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and who are willing to serve on the Committee against Torture.
3. Elections of the members of the Committee shall be held at biennial meetings of States Parties convened by the Secretary-General of the United Nations. At those meetings, for which two thirds of the States Parties shall constitute a quorum, the persons elected to the Committee shall be those who obtain the largest number of votes and an absolute majority of the votes of the representatives of States Parties present and voting.
4. The initial election shall be held no later than six months after the date of the entry into force of this Convention. At least four months before the date of each election, the Secretary-General of the United Nations shall address a letter to the States Parties inviting them to submit their nominations within three months. The Secretary-General shall prepare a list in alphabetical order of all persons thus nominated, indicating the States Parties which have nominated them, and shall submit it to the States Parties.
5. The members of the Committee shall be elected for a term of four years. They shall be eligible for re-election if renominated. However, the term of five of the members elected at the first election shall expire at the end of two years; immediately after the first election the names of these five members shall be chosen by lot by the chairman of the meeting referred to in paragraph 3 of this article.
6. If a member of the Committee dies or resigns or for any other cause can no longer perform his Committee duties, the State Party which nominated him shall appoint another expert from among its nationals to serve for the remainder of his term, subject to the approval of the majority of the States Parties. The approval shall be considered given unless half or more of the States Parties respond negatively within six weeks after having been informed by the Secretary-General of the United Nations of the proposed appointment.
7. States Parties shall be responsible for the expenses of the members of the Committee while they are in performance of Committee duties.

1. Introduction

1 The Committee against Torture (hereinafter CAT Committee or the Committee) is one of the presently ten treaty monitoring bodies of the United Nations (UN), similar to the Human Rights Committee (HRC), the Committee on Economic, Social, and Cultural Rights (CESCR), the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (CERD), Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW), Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC), the Committee on Migrants Workers (CMW), and the more recently established bodies under the Convention for the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance (CED), the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities (CRPD) and the Optional Protocol to the Convention Against Torture (OPCAT).¹ Since the Committee is modelled on the HRC established in accordance with Article 28 CCPR, the following considerations will be fairly brief and draw upon the interpretation developed in the CCPR Commentary.²

2 Strictly speaking, the Committee is not a body of the UN but a relatively autonomous quasi-judicial treaty based organ created by the States parties of the Convention. This is underlined by the fact that all ten expert members of the Committee must be nationals of, and are nominated and elected by, States parties. In addition, Article 17(7) requires States parties to bear the financial responsibility for the expenses of Committee members. In practice, this has led to serious financial problems which were solved by integrating the Committee more into the UN.

3 The Committee has more monitoring functions than some of the other treaty bodies. In addition to the mandatory State reporting procedure under Article 19 and the optional inter-State and individual complaints procedures under Articles 21 and 22, the Committee is also entrusted by virtue of Article 20 to carry out confidential ex officio inquiries in the case of well-founded indications that torture is being systematically practised in a State party. The inquiry procedure is mandatory but States parties may 'opt out' in accordance with Article 28. With the entry into force of the Optional Protocol to the CAT in 2006, the Committee also assumed a further, albeit limited, function of supervising the work of the newly created Sub-Committee on Prevention of Torture (SPT).³

7. The members of the Committee shall receive emoluments as well as compensation for their expenses while they are in performance of the Committee functions, on such terms and missions as the biennial meetings of States Parties may decide. The States Parties shall be responsible for these emoluments and expenses in the same proportions as their contributions to the general budget of the UN.

2.2 Analysis of Working Group Discussions

10 The Working Group of the Human Rights Commission did not deal with the supervisory mechanism of the Convention in its sessions between 1978 and 1980. However, the written comments of several States, made in 1978, on the implementation provisions of the original Swedish draft Convention,¹⁰ shaped the subsequent discussions of the Working Group.¹¹

11 The question of the nature and composition of the enforcement mechanism was discussed, for the first time, during the Working Group session in 1981.¹² Several proposals were subject to the deliberations of the Working Group. The original Swedish draft suggested in its Articles 16 to 21 that the implementation monitoring of the Convention should be carried out by the HRC established by Article 28 CCPR.¹³ The proposal of the IAPL (in its articles XIII and XIV),¹⁴ also attributed the monitoring of the implementation of the CAT to the HRC, but, in addition, provided for the appointment of a Special Committee on the Prevention of Torture (Article 13). The latter would consist of five members of the HRC who were also nationals of the States parties to the CAT. Both proposals provided for the monitoring of the implementation of the Convention based primarily on mandatory State reporting as well as inter-State and individual complaints procedures.¹⁵

12 In 1980, Costa Rica submitted a draft Optional Protocol¹⁶ which provided for the establishment of an Independent International Committee as supervisory body authorized to arrange preventive visits to places of detention of all kinds under the jurisdiction of the States parties having ratified the OP.¹⁷

13 Moreover, the Netherlands had submitted an amendment to the Swedish proposal modifying Article 16 and providing for the establishment of a new Committee that would be composed of members of the HRC, functioning as the supervisory body of the Convention.¹⁸ According to an additional Article, the procedures provided for in the CCPR and/or in the Protocol would apply between States parties to the Convention which were also parties to the CCPR and which had accepted the competence of the HRC under Article 41 and/or under the first OP to the CCPR, whereas otherwise the procedures provided for in the Convention would apply.

14 During this session, the Working Group also discussed a telegram by the Legal Counsel of the United Nations, explaining the legal difficulties that would be encountered if the monitoring mechanism of the Convention were the HRC.¹⁹ According to the Legal Counsel this proposal would constitute a modification of the terms of the CCPR. Moreover, the general concordance in purpose of Article 7 CCPR and the Convention would not be sufficient to give monitoring competence over the CAT to the HRC, since the latter must function in compliance with its constituent treaty.²⁰

15 Several delegations who shared the opinion of the Legal Counsel concerning the potential difficulties involved stated that the parties to the Convention and the CCPR would not necessarily be the same.²¹

16 In general, some States (for example Argentina and Brazil) defended the option of self-enforcement, meaning that each State party would oversee its own implementation of the Convention.²² It was therefore suggested that international supervision should be optional. However, the opponents to this suggestion pointed out that self-enforcement would be unrealistic as evidenced by the fact that torture was still widely practised despite national and international legislation prohibiting the practice. In view of other delegations including the Soviet Union, the task of implementation could also be entrusted to the Human Rights Commission or to its Sub-Commission.²³

17 Sweden submitted a second proposal which provided for the establishment of a new Committee acting as the only supervisory body of the Convention.²⁴ According to this proposal 'the members of the Committee shall be nationals of States Parties, serve in their personal capacity and shall as far as possible be chosen among members of the Human Rights Committee. Members shall be elected for a period of four years.'²⁵

18 During the 1982 Working Group it was discussed whether the implementation procedures should have a mandatory or optional character. Some delegations expressed doubts regarding the advisability of establishing international bodies with extensive jurisdiction and stated that the implementation provisions should be made optional.²⁶

19 The continued deliberations regarding the nature and composition of the implementation organ were based on a new Swedish proposal with a complete set of eighteen alternative implementation provisions, mostly modelled according to the corresponding provisions of the CCPR²⁷ and an alternative proposal of four draft articles and an explanatory note by the Chairman-Rapporteur.²⁸ The latter suggested a supervisory body consisting of five members of the Human Rights Commission (nationals of the States parties) who were appointed by the Chairman of the Human Rights Commission (paragraph 2 of the Rapporteur's draft article); this formula was borrowed from the International Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid.²⁹ The Swedish proposal provided for the establishment of a new Committee against Torture consisting of nine nationals of the States parties to be nominated and then elected by States parties.

20 In general, a number of delegations reacted to the Chairman's proposal by stating that such a supervisory body would introduce strong political factors, which was undesirable since the Convention aims to prohibit torture by public officials.³⁰ Furthermore, questions were raised regarding the criteria for selection.³¹ Thus, it was proposed that the members of the new supervisory body should be appointed by the Chairman of the HRC from the members of the latter Committee.³²

21 Although some representatives of States parties expressed their concern regarding the multiplication of international organs, pointing out that a new body would create sizeable financial implications,³³ a number of delegates stated their preference for the Swedish proposal. They pointed to its advantage of providing for independence of Committee members from governmental instructions or pressures since the members of the Committee would serve 'in their personal capacity'.³⁴ In the opinion of these delegations, the fact that the members of the Committee should 'so far as possible' also be members of the Committee would enhance harmonization between the implementation mechanism of the CCPR and the Convention and avoid the legal problems pointed out by the Legal Counsel of the United Nations.³⁵

22 In 1982 the Working Group did not come to any consensus and continued its discussions regarding the nature and composition of the implementation organ during its session in 1983. The majority of delegations clearly preferred the implementation organ to be elected by States parties, as had been proposed by Sweden.³⁶ However, since the Swedish proposal regarding the implementation provisions was drafted in considerable detail in twelve articles modelled according to the CCPR, the Chairman-Rapporteur submitted a draft with four simpler provisions on implementation taking into consideration the corresponding provisions in CERD and CEDAW.³⁷ On the basis of this draft, the delegations discussed the size of the Committee. Some speakers stated that nine was too small as decisions may sometimes be taken by only three members since the quorum was set at five.³⁸ Moreover, it would be difficult to reflect an equal geographical distribution with nine experts.³⁹

23 The delegations were still unable to agree on whether the implementation system should have an optional or mandatory character. Some States continued to object to a mandatory character of the implementation provisions. In particular the Soviet Union, arguing that the inclusion of a mandatory implementation system in the Convention was not necessary for those States that were already bound by the implementation provisions of the CCPR, suggested an optional protocol containing the implementation procedures and said that this would facilitate worldwide support of the Convention.⁴⁰ Other delegations were in favour of provisions with a mandatory character, stating that to make implementation optional was tantamount to allowing a qualified commitment to the fight against torture; moreover, it could lead to varying degrees of obligations on States parties. The delegation of the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic suggested as a compromise, to retain the implementation provisions in the Convention but to introduce a clause which required that a State party recognize the competence of the Committee.⁴¹ No final decision was taken regarding the abovementioned issues.

24 During this Working Group session Article 17(6) and (7) of the Chairman's proposal was also a topic of discussion. Some delegations criticized the modus of filling vacancies provided for in paragraph 6 which had been taken verbatim from the corresponding mechanisms of the anti-discrimination Conventions of 1965 and 1979.⁴² Ideally, vacancies should be filled using the same system as used for designating the original members, namely through election by States parties (eg articles 33 and 34 CCPR). Therefore, the Chairman-Rapporteur submitted another proposal for paragraph 6⁴³ which suggested that the appointment of a new member should be 'subject to the approval of the majority of States Parties'.⁴⁴

25 Regarding the proposal for paragraph 7, according to which States parties shall be responsible for the expenses 'in the same proportion as their contributions to the general budget of the United Nations', some delegations stated that States parties to the Convention may not necessarily be members of the United Nations. They therefore expressed their preference for the analogous provision of CERD, providing for the coverage of the expenses of the members for their Committee duties by States parties, such as submitted in proposal by the Chairman-Rapporteur.

26 During its fifth session in 1984, the Working Group finally adopted Article 17 CAT. The Soviet Union had informed the Group that it would no longer insist on the optional character of the provision concerning the creation of an implementation organ, and the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic also took a similar stand and withdrew its respective draft Article 17.⁴⁵ Furthermore, the Working Group had decided that the Committee should consist of ten instead of nine experts elected for four years. In this regard, the part of the second sentence of paragraph 5 stating that after the first election four members should be chosen by the Chairman to serve only for two years, was accordingly amended to 'five' members.⁴⁶ Concerning all other paragraphs the Working Group agreed on the last submitted version.

3. Issues of Interpretation

3.1 Nature and Functions of the Committee

27 The aims of the Convention are threefold: to establish specific obligations for States parties to prevent torture and to assist victims of torture; to require the use of criminal law and jurisdiction to fight impunity of torturers; and to provide for stronger measures of international monitoring of States' compliance with the absolute prohibition of torture.

28 The original Swedish draft contained a proposal which would entrust the HRC with the monitoring of State compliance. The IAPL even suggested that the eighteen-member HRC appoint a five-member Special Committee on the Prevention of Torture. After the Legal Counsel of the UN explained the legal difficulties of burdening an already existing treaty body with additional duties stemming from another treaty, the Working Group finally agreed on the creation of an independent treaty body for the CAT. However, reaching this conclusion had not been easy. Argentina and Brazil had even proposed that each State oversee its own implementation of the Convention, while the Soviet Union wished to make international monitoring purely optional, and the Dutch Chairman-Rapporteur suggested entrusting the monitoring to a group of five members of the Human Rights Commission, similar to the Apartheid Convention. Despite a certain reluctance against a further proliferation of UN treaty monitoring bodies, the Working Group finally agreed on the creation of a fourth independent treaty body, after the CERD Committee (established in 1970), HRC (established in 1976), and the CEDAW Committee (established in 1981). Yet the States continued insisting that the CAT Committee be smaller than the other treaty bodies. The Swedish proposal of nine members was later extended to ten. Since the prohibition of torture was already contained in the CCPR, the Swedish proposal for implementation provisions also maintained a certain link between the HRC and the CAT Committee. This is reflected in Article 17(2) CAT according to which States parties shall bear in mind the usefulness of nominating persons who are also members of the HRC.

29 The main monitoring functions of the Committee are laid down in Articles 19 to 22: consideration of State reports including adoption of concluding observations and general comments; conducting of ex officio inquiry procedures including fact-finding missions to the countries concerned; examination of inter-State communications including the establishment of an ad hoc conciliation commission; and examination of individual communications. After the entry into force of the OPCAT in June 2006, the SPT was established with the functions of carrying out preventive visits to places of detention and of cooperating with the national preventive mechanisms to be established in every State party to the OPCAT. Article 10(3) OPCAT and Rule 62 CAT provide that the Committee shall meet with the SPT at least once a year, during the regular sessions they both hold simultaneously. According to Article 16(3) OP and Rule 63 CAT, the SPT shall present a public annual report on its activities to the Committee. If a State party refuses to cooperate with the SPT, the Committee, in accordance with Article 16(4) OP, may decide to make a public statement on the findings, recommendations and observations of the SPT in relation to a specific visit.

⁴⁶ ibid, para 46.

3.2 Composition of the Committee—Article 17(1)

30 The respective provisions of Article 17 are based on Articles 28 to 32 CCPR.⁴⁷ In contrast to the HRC and the majority of other UN treaty monitoring bodies, the CAT Committee only consists of ten members.⁴⁸

31 Although the members are nominated by States parties and elected by the meetings of States parties, they serve, pursuant to Article 17(1), as individual ‘experts of high moral standing and recognized competence in the field of human rights’ who ‘shall serve in their personal capacity’, ie they do not represent their country nor their region. This independence from States parties is further underlined by Article 23, which entitles them to the ‘facilities, privileges and immunities of experts on mission for the United Nations’. Before assuming their duties, according to Rule 14, Committee members shall make a solemn declaration that they will perform their duties ‘honourably, faithfully, impartially and conscientiously’. Rule 15 further emphasizes the importance of impartiality and independence. In the performance of their duties, Committee members shall maintain the ‘highest standards of impartiality and integrity’. Members are ‘accountable only to the Committee and their own conscience’. Hence, they shall ‘neither seek nor accept instructions from anyone’.⁴⁹ Rule 15 also explicitly recalls the Addis Ababa Guidelines on the independence and impartiality of members of the human rights treaty bodies, which since 2014 are integral part of the RoP of the CAT constituting an Annex.⁵⁰ This high degree of independence and impartiality justifies regarding the Committee as a quasi-judicial organ. Yet, in reality ambassadors and other civil servants have regularly been elected to the Committee.⁵¹ In this regard, more clarity is brought by the Addis Ababa Guidelines.⁵² Explicitly regulating the relationship of treaty members with States, the Guidelines specify that independence and impartiality ‘is compromised by the political nature of their affiliation with the executive branch of the State’ and that treaty bodies’ members should therefore ‘avoid functions or activities which are, or are seen by a reasonable observer to be, incompatible with the obligations and responsibilities of independent experts’ (Guideline D). The Guidelines further spell out that individual holding or assuming decision-making positions in any organization or entity which may give rise to a real or perceived conflict of interest shall ‘whenever so required, not undertake any functions or activities that may appear not to be readily reconcilable with the perception of independence and impartiality’ (Guideline E). The relevance of the independence of members of human rights treaty bodies was further reaffirmed in the GA resolution 68/268, where it was stressed how important it is that all stakeholders, including the Secretariat, respect the independence of the members and avoid any interference with their mandate.⁵³

32 Pursuant to Article 17 there are other relevant factors to be taken into account when electing Committee members. Further to being independent, under Article 17(1) members of the Committee shall also be experts of ‘high moral standing and recognized competence in the field of human rights’. In this regard, if the GA recommendations 68/268 of 2014 generally encourages States to nominate individuals with competence and expertise ‘in particular in the field covered by the relevant treaty’,⁵⁴ Article 17 provides explicitly that for the election of CAT members consideration shall be given to the ‘usefulness of the participation of some persons having legal experience’. This provision has been taken literally from Article 28(2) CCPR but has no equivalent in other UN human rights treaties. In addition, Article 17(2) provides that States parties shall bear in mind the ‘usefulness of nominating persons who are also members of the HRC’. Both provisions underline that the prevention and prohibition of torture is primarily a civil right that requires specific legal expertise. Since the prohibition of torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment is already contained in Article 7 CCPR, the original Swedish draft had even suggested entrusting the specific monitoring functions of the Convention to the HRC. After respective legal problems had been raised by the Legal Counsel of the UN and a number of States, a compromise of establishing a certain link with the HRC and its legal expertise had been reached which was first reflected in the revised Swedish draft.⁵⁵

33 In practice, while the HRC consists almost exclusively of persons with a legal background which is also underlined by the high legal quality of its work,⁵⁶ the composition of the CAT Committee is more diverse. While law professors and legal practitioners constitute the majority, many experts have a different professional background, above all medical doctors, psychologists, political scientists, and journalists.⁵⁷ In our opinion, this composition better corresponds to the multidisciplinary task of combating and preventing torture.

34 On the other side, the idea of linking the membership of the CAT Committee with the HRC was implemented only in a few cases. For example, the French judge Christine Chanut, who served on the HRC from 1987 until 2006, also served on the CAT Committee from 1988 until 1991. The first Chairperson of the HRC, Ambassador Andreas Mavrommatis from Cyprus, who served on the HRC from 1977 to 1996, was elected to the CAT Committee in 1998 and has acted as its Chairperson from 2006 to 2008. Julio Prado Vallejo from Ecuador who served as an expert within the HRC from 1976 to 1986, was also a member of the CAT Committee for a short period in 2006 before he died on 20 October 2006.

⁵⁷ As of December 2017 the membership of the Committee is composed by five members with legal background (Ms Essadia BELMIR; Ms. Sapana PRADHAN-MALLA; Ms Ana RACU; Mr Sébastien TOUZÉ; Mr Kening ZHANG); two members with medical background (Mr Jens MODVIG and Mr Abdelwahab HANI); one diplomat (Mr Claude HELLER ROUASSANT) and two political scientists (Mr Alessio BRUNI and Ms Felice GAER). For a complete list of experts who have served on the Committee since 1988 see below Appendix A.6.

35 Article 17(1) further requires to give consideration to ‘equitable geographical distribution’. Although there is no formal quota, such requirement can be found in every UN human rights treaty as a general principle for the composition of UN bodies.⁵⁸ Most treaties, including Article 9 of the ICJ Statute and Article 31(2) CCPR, also contain the need for an ‘equitable representation of the different forms of civilization and of the principal legal systems’, which is, however, not reflected in Article 17 CAT.⁵⁹ Since the CAT Committee consists of only ten members, the most equal geographical distribution would be two members per each of the five UN geopolitical regions. On the other hand, ‘equitable’ distribution means a composition which corresponds as proportionally as possible to the number of States parties per region.⁶⁰ Whether the maintenance of an Eastern European Group and a Western and Others Group is still justified more than twenty years after the end of the Cold War is another question that might be taken into account when considering the most equitable geographic distribution.

36 After the first election in 1987, the Committee was composed of four experts from the Western Group, two each from the Eastern European and Latin American Groups, and only one each from the Asian and African Groups. At that time, the Western Group had by far the highest number of States parties (nine out of a total of twenty-seven States parties). Some representatives, in particular those from African States, regretted that only one African member was elected, which in their view contradicted the informal consensus of one member from Asia, two from Latin America, two from Eastern Europe, three from Western Europe, and two from Africa, reached during the preparatory consultations in form of a ‘gentleman’s agreement’.⁶¹ Two years later, the States parties gave due account to the consensus regarding equitable distribution; two African representatives were elected.⁶² As of December 2017, the Committee consists of four experts from the Western Group (40%); two from the African (20%) and the Asian Groups (20%), and one from the Latin American (10%), and the Eastern European groups (10%).⁶³ Compared to the number of States parties from the respective regions (30 Western European and other; 49 African, 23 Latin American, 23 Eastern European, and 38 Asia Pacific States), this composition can no longer be considered equitable.

37 Although not explicitly mentioned in the Convention, gender equality should also be taken into consideration.⁶⁴ In this sense, the GA in its resolution 68/268 of 2014 explicitly encouraged States parties to inter alia consider ‘balanced gender representation’ within each treaty body Committee.⁶⁵ As of December 2017, four out of ten members of the Committee are women.⁶⁶ The GA further encouraged States parties to nominate ‘experts with disabilities in the membership of the human rights treaty bodies’.⁶⁷ As it will be seen below, since the elections must be carried out by secret ballot, there is no guarantee that any of the principles mentioned above are fully taken into account.

⁵⁸ GA Res 68/268 of 9 April 2014 (n 53) para 13. The only UN human rights treaty providing for a formal quota for regional groups is the CESCPR see OHCHR, ‘Human Rights Treaty Bodies and Election of Treaty Body Members: A Guide for United Nations Delegates Based in New York’ (2013) 12 (‘Guide’).

3.3 Nomination and election of Committee members—

Article 17 (2)–(6)

3.3.1 Nomination

38 The nomination and election of Committee members are regulated by Article 17(2)–(6) and Rules 11 to 15, which elaborate further on the election procedure, the filling of vacancies, the solemn declaration, and the independence and impartiality of members of the Committee.

39 Under Article 17(2) the right of nomination of candidates rests exclusively with States parties to the Convention. While CCPR and OPCAT empower each State party to nominate up to two candidates,⁶⁸ the CAT restricts the right of nomination to one person who must be a national of the nominating State. In practice, this no longer makes much of a difference since nominating two persons necessarily reduces their election chances.⁶⁹ Regional groups often agree on a reduced number of candidates from their respective groups in order to increase their chances of being elected. Usually, political considerations and trade-offs among States play a role which is as decisive as the individual qualification of the respective candidates. At least four months before the date of each election, the UN Secretary-General shall address a letter to all States parties to the Convention inviting them to submit their nominations within three months. The Secretariat will then prepare a list of candidates and nominating States and shares it with the States parties.⁷⁰ If such deadline is not respected, it cannot be guaranteed that candidate’s details are processed and shared to all States parties before the date of the election. In any event, it is a well-established practice for the meeting of States parties to endorse the nomination of candidates received after the deadline.⁷¹

40 Although the CAT leaves the nomination process up to States parties, in exercising their right to nomination States parties shall bear in mind the usefulness of nominating persons who are also members of the HRC. Furthermore, the High Commissioner for Human Rights has encouraged States to adopt an open and transparent process, give consideration to expertise in the relevant area, willingness to take over responsibilities, avoid nominations of candidates holding positions that might create conflicts of interests or lack of independence, and limit the terms of service of a member to a reasonable number.⁷² All candidates may be withdrawn and re-nominated, whether elected or not.

3.3.2 Election

41 Pursuant to Article 17(3) Committee members are elected at biennial meetings of States parties convened by the UN Secretary-General. In contrast to other UN human rights treaty bodies, for which meeting of States parties always take place at UN Headquarters in New York, for the CAT elections take place in Geneva in the month of October every two years (odd years).⁷³ In practice, meetings of States parties are organized by OHCHR.

42 The election procedure is laid down in Article 17(3) and in the RoP of the Meeting of States parties to the CAT.⁷⁴ These are modelled on Article 30 CCPR and the RoP of the Meeting of States parties to the CCPR.⁷⁵ At least two-thirds of the States parties shall be represented in the meeting of States parties (quorum). If less than two-thirds of the States parties are present, elections cannot take place. Candidates must be elected, through a secret ballot, by an absolute majority of States parties present and voting. Representatives of States parties who abstain from voting are considered as not voting.⁷⁶ Each State party may vote for as many candidates as there are seats to be filled, ie usually five. Should more than five candidates receive an absolute majority, those who obtain the largest number of votes are elected. In the case of a draw on the vote, although no provision is included with this regard in the RoP of the Meetings of States parties, it is most likely that the situation would be resolved by a tie-breaker vote.⁷⁷ If fewer than five candidates receive an absolute majority, additional balloting is required.⁷⁸ Votes may be cast for those unelected candidates who obtained the most votes in the previous ballot, with a maximum of twice as many candidates being eligible for election as there are places remaining to be filled. If all five members are still not elected after the third inconclusive ballot, then all candidates are to take part in subsequent balloting. In this situation as well, draws on the vote would likely to be resolved by a tie-breaker vote.⁷⁹ Since Article 17(3) CAT expressly requires an absolute majority of votes, in no case may a candidate who has achieved only a relative majority be considered elected.⁸⁰

43 It is, in fact, not uncommon for either of the scenarios to occur. One example is the election procedure of the tenth meeting of the States parties to the CAT in 2005.⁸¹ During this meeting, five members were elected to the CAT Committee to replace those whose terms of office were due to expire on 31 December 2005. Following the standard procedure, in accordance with Article 17, a vote was taken by secret ballot. Of the eight candidates up for election, six obtained the required majority of fifty-eight votes. Because there were more successful candidates than there were available seats, the five candidates having obtained both the required majority and the largest number of votes were elected to the Committee.

44 The opposite situation has also occurred, albeit less frequently. As exemplified during the fourth meeting of the States parties to the CAT in 1993, the standard voting procedure is slightly more complicated when the election yields fewer successful candidates than seats available.⁸² This specific election required four separate ballots to fill the five vacant seats. Moreover, despite complying with Rule 15, the procedure followed in order to determine the candidates for the last vacant seat met with opposition from four different delegations. The issue in this case was that there were five seats up for election, yet after both the first and second ballots, only three candidates had obtained the required majority (three in the first ballot, and none in the second). Since no candidate had been successful after the second ballot, according to Rule 12, a third ballot was needed. One candidate obtained the required majority in the third ballot and a fourth ballot was proposed in order to elect the fifth and final member of the Committee. The Chairperson proposed that the election should be between the two candidates with the largest number of votes among those who had not obtained the necessary majority in the third ballot. The delegations of Uruguay, Morocco, Yemen, and Jordan objected to the procedure as proposed by the Chairperson and referred to Rule 15, which stated that ‘after the third inconclusive ballot, votes may be cast for any eligible nominee’. However, the Secretary of the Committee emphasized the need to restrict the voting to the candidates who had obtained the largest number of votes. He also referred to Rule 15 in order to explain that the rule pertaining to ‘inconclusive’ ballots did not apply in this instance and, therefore, the voting should proceed as proposed by the Chairperson. Although the Chairperson took note of the comment made by the Uruguayan representative who pointed out that the text of Rule 15 was not harmonized in all languages because the Spanish text did not contain the word ‘inconclusive’, he still endorsed the Secretariat’s position regarding Rule 15. He also said that it was necessary to respect the precedent established during the election of members to the Committee on the Rights of the Child. A fourth ballot was thus held between the two candidates who had amassed the largest number of votes in the previous election and a final member was the fifth elected. The initial election had to be held no later than six months after the entry into force of the Convention.⁸³ Pursuant to Article 27(1), the Convention entered into force on 26 June 1987, and the first elections took place exactly five months later during the first meeting of the States parties on 26 November 1987.⁸⁴

45 Under Article 17(5), also based on Article 32(1) CCPR, Committee members are elected for a term of four years and are eligible for re-election if renominated. In contrast to other UN treaties,⁸⁵ the CAT does not limit the number of renominations and re-elections, allowing in principle unlimited re-election. In accordance with Rule 12(1), the term of office of the members elected at subsequent elections shall begin on the day after the date of expiry of the term of office of the members whom they replace. In 2002, the Committee added a second paragraph to this rule, thereby allowing the officers of the Committee to continue performing their duties until one day before the first meeting of the Committee, composed of its new members, when it then elects its officers (Rule 12(2)).⁸⁶

The following twenty-seven States were parties to the Convention then: Afghanistan, Argentina, Austria, Belize, Bulgaria, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Cameroon, Canada, Denmark, Egypt, France, German Democratic Republic, Hungary, Luxembourg, Mexico, Norway, Panama, Philippines, Senegal, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Togo, Uganda, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, USSR, and Uruguay.

46 In order to ensure continuity in membership, as in other UN human rights treaties,⁸⁷ elections are staggered and the principle of partial renewal applies. Immediately after the first election, the names of five elected members whose term of office expired after two years were chosen by lot. The meeting of States parties agreed that the term of office of all Committee members started on 1 January 1988.⁸⁸ Since the term of the five members chosen by lot expired on 31 December 1989, the second regular meeting of States parties took place on 19 December 1989. Every two years, the States parties elect five members. In doing so, they aim to strike a fair balance between the principles of continuity and that of renewal.

47 Some Committee members have been re-elected several times.⁸⁹ Three original members of the Committee, Mr Alexis Dipanda Mouelle from Cameroon (January 1988 to December 1997), Mr Bent Sørensen from Denmark (January 1988 to December 1999) and Mr Peter Thomas Burns from Canada (January 1988 to December 2003) served for respectively ten, twelve, and sixteen years in their function. From the current Committee members, Ms Felice Gaer from the USA has served since 2000, which makes her the longest serving member thus far.

3.3.3 Casual Vacancies

48 Article 17(6) and Rule 13 regulate the occurrence of casual vacancies, the declaration of vacant seats, and filling of casual vacancies in the CAT Committee. A casual vacancy may occur in three cases: if a Committee member dies, resigns, or if he/she 'for any other cause can no longer perform his Committee duties'. During its discussions of the RoP in 1988, the Committee considered the meaning of the term 'any other cause' in Article 17(6). While the Committee thought it difficult to define the term more precisely, it rightly stressed that this provision cannot be interpreted as referring to any kind of political interference on the part of a State but rather relates to the personal circumstances of the Committee member to be replaced.⁹⁰ In practice, nine Committee members have so far resigned from their duties and two experts passed away while they were members. They were replaced by other experts appointed by the respective States parties without any objections from other States parties.⁹¹ Questions of interpretations in relation to the words 'any other cause' arose in one case. A member from Uruguay, Mr Hugo Lorenzo, who had been elected to the Committee in 1991, was appointed to serve as an international civil servant within the UN human rights mission MINUGUA in Guatemala. Although he was not allowed by the UN Secretary-General to attend the fourteenth session in May 1995 and further meetings of the Committee on grounds of alleged incompatibility between his present status of international civil servant and that of member of the Committee, he did not resign. Neither did the Secretary-General declare his seat vacant according to the procedure foreseen in Rule 13. As the respective discussions in the Committee revealed uncertainty about a possible incompatibility between the two functions, the Committee simply waited until his term of office expired.⁹² There is no convincing argument why the function of international civil servant (as domestic civil servant) should be considered generally incompatible if the respective expert finds sufficient time to attend Committee meetings. Rather this should depend on the question of independence and availability as for all other professions.

Pikiis in 1998; Ms. Ada. Polajnar-Pavcnik (Slovenia) replaced Mr. Bostjan Zupanic in 1999; Mr. Bent Sørensen (Denmark) was replaced in 2000 by Mr. Ole Vedel Rasmussen; in 2003 Mr. Claudio Grossmann (Chile) replaced Mr. Alejandro González Poblete who passed away; Mr. Xuexian Wang (China) was appointed in 2005 following the resignation of Mr. Yu Mengjia; in 2006 Mr. Luis Gallegos Chiriboga (Ecuador) was appointed as a successor to Mr. Julio Prado Vallejo who informed the Secretary-General in April 2006 of his decision to resign and later died on 20 October 2006; and 2014 in Sapana Pradhan-Malla. (Nepal) was appointed as a successor of Mr. Bhogendra Sharma who on 6 February 2014 informed the Secretary-General of his decision to cease his functions as a member of the Committee. See also Appendix A.6.

49 Where one of these three situations occur, in accordance with Rule 13(1), the Secretary-General shall immediately declare the seat of that member to be vacant and request the State party whose expert has ceased to function as a member to appoint another expert from among its nationals within two months, if possible, to serve for the remainder of the term of his or her predecessor. The appointment is subject to the silent approval of the majority of States parties. According to Article 17(6) and Rule 13(2), if States parties do not agree with the appointment they have to respond within six weeks after having been informed by the Secretary-General. Only objections by half of all States parties—which is highly unlikely ever to occur in practice—can prevent the appointment of a Committee member who is not deemed qualified or independent.

50 The procedure for filling casual vacancies set up by the CAT differs from that of other UN treaty bodies for two main reasons. First, unlike the CCPR, the CAT does not provide for the possibility of casual vacancies to be filled by an election at an extraordinary meeting of States parties if the State party does not replace the member within six months.⁹³ During the discussions in the Working Group, some delegations criticized this modus of filling vacancies and proposed, instead, to follow the system of special elections as provided for in Articles 33 and 34 CCPR.⁹⁴ In practice, however, the holding of special meetings of States parties to the CCPR for the sole purpose of filling vacancies of members of the HRC proved to be a fairly futile exercise because the States parties always elected the compatriots of the members who had died or resigned.⁹⁵ In addition, the procedure foreseen in Article 33 CCPR of declaring a seat of a HRC member vacant remained 'dead law'.⁹⁶ On the other hand, the system in the two anti-discrimination treaties, namely to subject the appointment by the State party to the approval of the respective expert bodies, does not seem to be an effective procedure against abusive practices by States parties.⁹⁷ The Chairman-Rapporteur, therefore, proposed a compromise aimed at avoiding the need to hold special sessions of States parties for the sole purpose of filling one vacancy, while at the same time providing States parties with the right to object to nominations which did not fulfil the minimum criteria of Committee membership provided for in Article 17.⁹⁸ Second, under the CAT the nomination of the new member by the original nominating State must be approved by the other States parties and not by the respective Committee as in most UN human rights treaties.⁹⁹

⁹⁹ Approval by the respective Committee is required under: CERD, CEDAW, CRC, and CMW; on the contrary approval by States parties is required also under CED. See OHCHR, 'Guide' (n 58) 24.

51 Furthermore, the procedure for declaring a seat of a Committee member vacant under Article 17(6) and Rule 13(1) is less specific than comparable provisions in other human rights instruments, most notably the CCPR. Article 17(6) CAT fails to specify any procedure to determine whether or not a member of the CAT Committee, apart from death or resignation, can no longer perform his or her duties due to illness, disability or any other cause. In contrast, Article 33(1) CCPR provides for a special impeachment procedure, involving the HRC, its Chairman and the UN Secretary-General. The procedure allows the Committee to terminate the term of office of a member who, in the unanimous opinion of the other members, “has ceased to carry out his functions for any cause other than absence of a temporary nature”. Whether the CAT Committee felt empowered to itself declare a seat of a Committee member vacant due to personal inconvenience or difficulty was deliberately left open during its discussions of the RoP in 1988. It is highly doubtful whether the impeachment procedure under Article 33 CCPR could be applied per analogiam if a member of the CAT Committee, for whatever reason, does not resign voluntarily. Even if a member is seriously ill or refrains from participating in the Committee’s sessions without any proper excuse, it is more prudent to wait until the expiry of his or her term of office rather than to remove the person without a proper procedure explicitly provided for in the Convention.¹⁰⁰

3.4 Financing of the Committee—Article 17(7)

52 Articles 17(7) and 18(5) deal with the financial issues of the Convention and its Committee. Whereas the activities of other treaty bodies do not provide for any financial responsibilities of States parties for the expenses of their Committees which are funded in the context of the regular UN budget, the CAT and CERD are the first international instruments in the field of human rights which provided for an implementation system relying on voluntary financial contributions of States parties.¹⁰¹

53 With respect to the financing of UN human rights treaty bodies, two different philosophies emerged.¹⁰² One line of argument is that UN treaty bodies are not organs of the UN and only carry out functions in relation to the respective States parties which, therefore, shall alone be responsible for bearing all the expenses for the members of treaty bodies, its secretariat, meetings, conference services, etc. This philosophy found its expression first in Article 8(6) CERD and was followed by other treaties, including Articles 17(7) and 18(5) CAT. During the Cold War, this was the argument most forcefully advanced by the Soviet Union and its allies. The opposite line of argument stressed that UN human rights treaties were not drafted merely for the benefit of a small group of States but rather in general served the promotion of international cooperation and other objectives of the United Nations, which called for the closest possible link with the world organization and the payment of all expenses out of the general UN budget. This philosophy, which was primarily advanced by Western States (with the exception of the United States), first found its expression in Article 35 CCPR. According to the aforementioned Article, members of the HRC shall ‘receive emoluments from United Nations resources on such terms and conditions as the General Assembly may decide, having regard to the importance of the Committee’s responsibilities’. In addition, Article 36 CCPR stipulates that the UN Secretary-General shall provide the necessary staff and facilities for the effective performance of the functions of the HRC. This model was followed by other human rights treaties, eg Article 17(8) and (9) CEDAW, Article 43(11) and (12) CRC, and Article 72(7) and (8) CMW, Article 36(7) CED, and Article 34(11) and (12) CRPD.

¹⁰⁰ On the dangers of such impeachment procedure see Nowak, CCPR Commentary (n 2) 685 et seq.

¹⁰² See Nowak, CCPR Commentary (n 2) 693ff with further references.

54 These two philosophies led to different treatment of UN treaty bodies. While the members of the other human rights treaties received a modest annual honorarium of US$3,000 (for the Chairperson, US$5,000), members of the CERD and CAT Committees received no honorarium. In practice, this financial dependence on States' contributions has been of great hindrance to the work of the Committee. The Committee had experienced severe difficulties in discharging its functions as a result of the delayed payments or non-payments of the contributions by States. During the UN financial crisis starting in the late 1980s, the CERD and CAT Committees were most seriously affected and had to cancel more sessions than other Committees due to a large number of outstanding contributions owed by the respective States parties. Consequently, the Chairpersons of the various treaty bodies called upon the General Assembly to finance all treaty bodies from the regular UN budget.¹⁰³ This recommendation has also been strongly supported by a well-known study by Philip Alston on UN treaty body reform.¹⁰⁴

55 In 1992, Australia proposed amendments to the relevant provisions of CERD and the CAT with a view to including the financing of the activities under the Convention in the regular budget of the UN. A conference of States parties, convened in accordance with Article 29(1) by the Secretary-General in New York on 9 September 1992, adopted those amendments which were subsequently endorsed by the General Assembly in its Resolution 47/111.¹⁰⁵ The General Assembly requested the Secretary-General to take the appropriate measures for financing the Committee from the regular budget of the UN beginning from the biennium 1994 to 1995.¹⁰⁶ According to the amendment, Articles 17(7) and 18(5) should be deleted and a new provision should be inserted as new paragraph 4 of Article 18: 'The members of the Committee established under the present Convention shall receive emoluments from United Nations resources on such terms and conditions as the General Assembly may decide.'¹⁰⁷ Amendments will enter into force after they have been accepted by two-thirds of the States parties. As of December 2017, only thirty-one parties have notified the Secretary-General that they have adopted the amendment.¹⁰⁸ Therefore, this amendment is not yet in force. However, as a provisional measure, the General Assembly has agreed to cover the expenses of the Committee out of the UN budget.¹⁰⁹ In 2002, the General Assembly also decided to reduce the modest honorarium paid so far to the members of the HRC, the CEDAW, and CRC Committee as well as to the International Law Commission and similar expert bodies to the symbolic sum of US1$, which was strongly criticized by the respective bodies.¹¹⁰ On the other hand, one might argue that equality among the UN experts (members of treaty bodies, special procedures, etc) has been achieved. Taking into account, however, how much time many UN experts spend on their respective UN functions, only few privileged individuals, such as university professors, affluent practising lawyers, or retired civil servants, can afford to serve several months per year for the UN without any honorarium.

1. Introduction

1 Article 18 CAT corresponds to Articles 35 to 39 CCPR. The Committee against Torture (CAT Committee or Committee), as the Human Rights Committee (HRC), elects its officers (a Chairperson, three Vice-Chairpersons and a Rapporteur) and adopts its own Rules of Procedure (RoP), subject only to the procedural provisions in Articles 19 to 22 and a few other rules contained in the Convention. This means that the Committee is free to decide about the number of its sessions (subject, of course, to financial constraints and the availability of UN conference services), its officers and subsidiary bodies (working groups and rapporteurs), its official and working languages, and its conduct of business, including voting and election methods.

2 As it will be seen below, the Committee first deliberated on its RoP on the basis of draft rules prepared by the Secretary-General. After their adoption at the first session, the RoP were further expanded and amended at the second, thirteenth, fifteenth, twenty-eighth, forty-fifth, and lastly fiftieth session. The RoP of the Committee are modelled on those of the HRC which, in turn, are based on the RoP of the Committee on the Elimination on Racial Discrimination (CERD).

3 After a short overview of the travaux préparatoires, this article provides a brief overview of the general rules (1 to 64) of the RoP in light of the practice of the Committee, the Secretariat and States parties. The rules (65 to 121) relating to the functions of the Committee in the State reporting, inquiry, inter-State, and individual complaints procedures will be analysed in the context of the relevant provisions in Articles 19 to 22.

2.2 Analysis of Working Group Discussions

6 The Working Group of the Human Rights Commission did not deal with the supervisory mechanism of the Convention in its sessions between 1978 and 1980. Although the Working Group started its deliberations on the implementation provisions in 1981, Article 18 was discussed for the first time only during the 1983 session. The Working Group based its discussion on the draft Article 18 submitted by the Chairman-Rapporteur.³ Paragraphs 1, 2, 3, and 4 of this draft Article are modelled on Articles 39(1)–(2), 36, and 37(1)–(2) CCPR. The Working Group reached a consensus on the first four paragraphs, making only one amendment based on Chairman-Rapporteur J Herman Burgers' observation that the second paragraph contained an error and should read 'six members' instead of 'five members'.

7 The Working Group discussions on this draft focused almost exclusively on the financial aspects because paragraph 5 constituted a new type of financial regulation in the field of human rights treaties. The United States suggested adding the following final paragraph:⁴

The States Parties shall be responsible for expenses incurred in connection with the holding of the meetings of the States Parties and of the Committee, including reimbursement to the United Nations for any expenses, such as the cost of the staff and facilities, incurred by the United Nations pursuant to paragraph 3 above.

8 Some delegations supported this paragraph, considering it inappropriate for the United Nations (UN) to bear expenses for an entity existing outside the UN, and to which UN members were not legally committed to finance or support. Other States said that they could not accept the new paragraph because it might hinder less affluent States in their decision to become a member of the Convention. In addition, they worried that this rule would give the impression that the UN considered the fight against torture less important than the elimination of discrimination against women,⁵ whose Committee is funded by the UN.⁶

9 Nevertheless, during the Working Group session in 1984, no delegation persisted in its opposition to paragraph 5, and it was consequently adopted during the fifth meeting.⁷

3. Issues of Interpretation

3.1 Rules of Procedure

10 Article 18 did not give rise to major discussions during its drafting in the Working Group and contains only a few provisions in need of interpretation. Article 18 (2) empowers the Committee to establish its own RoP by simple majority, without approval of any other organ.⁸ The RoP established by the Committee are modelled on the RoP of the HRC which, in turn, are based on those of the CRPD Committee. During its first session, the Committee deliberated on the basis of draft rules prepared by the Secretary-General.⁹ After the adoption at the first session,¹⁰ the RoP were further expanded and amended at the second, thirteenth, fifteenth, twenty-eighth, forty-fifth, and lastly fiftieth session.¹¹

11 The RoP with regard to the inquiry procedure under Article 20 were only first discussed at the second session.¹² Since this was a new procedure in the field of human rights treaties, the Secretary of the Committee preferred first to undertake a detailed review of other similar procedures existing within the UN system before proceeding further.¹³ The amendments made during the thirteenth, fifteenth, and twenty-eighth sessions primarily concerned the Rules regarding the State reporting procedure under Article 19 and the individual complaints procedure under Article 22.¹⁴ At its forty-fifth session extensive changes were introduced especially with regard to the decisions taken by the meetings of chairpersons of human rights treaty bodies and the inter-committee meetings, and to bring them in line with new methods of work that the Committee is implementing as well as to include the adoption of new procedures.¹⁵ Amendments in the fiftieth session aimed at strengthening the independence and impartiality of the members and were adopted to endorse the Addis Ababa guidelines.¹⁶

12 The RoP are divided into two parts: the first part sets out general rules governing the functioning of the Committee and its decision making (Rules 1 to 64); the second part covers rules relating to the functions of the Committee (Rules 65 to 121). In contrast to other UN human rights treaties, the RoP of the CAT Committee do not contain a specific section on interpretation, nor do they include the RoP of their Optional Protocol, as Article 10 OPCAT empowered the Subcommittee on the Prevention of Torture (SPT) to adopt its own RoP.¹⁷

¹¹ For the current version of the RoP as lastly amended by the Committee at its fiftieth session in 2013 see CAT/C/3/Rev.6. Provisional RoP—not yet regulating the procedure on the inquiry procedure under Article 20—were initially adopted by the Committee at its first session in 1988 with UN symbol CAT/C/3 (Report of the Committee Against Torture (1988) UN Doc A/43/46, Annex III) and then amended at its second session in 1989 (CAT/C/3/Rev.1; Report of the Committee Against Torture (1989) UN Doc A/44/46, Annex IV); at its thirteenth session in 1994 (CAT/C/3/Rev.1; Report of the Committee Against Torture (1995) UN Doc A/50/44, para 14 and Annex VI); at the fifteenth session in 1995 (CAT/C/3/Rev.3; Report of the Committee Against Torture (1996) UN Doc A/51/44, para 282 and Annex VI); at the twenty-eighth session in 2002 (CAT/C/3/Rev.4; Report of the Committee Against Torture Twenty-seventh Session (12–23 November 2001) Twenty-eighth Session (29 April–17 May 2002) (2002) UN Doc A/57/44, para 15 and Annex X), and the forty-fifth session in 2010 (CAT/C/3/Rev.5; A/66/44, Annex IX); and lastly at its fiftieth session. It is to be noted that both amendments made at the second and thirteenth are referred to by the Committee as ‘CAT/C/3/Rev.1’; this seems to be a mistake as the subsequent amendments of the fifteenth session are in fact referred to as CAT/C/3/Rev.3. 3.2 Meaning of ‘officers’

13 Article 18(1) is taken verbatim from Article 39(1) CCPR, which is based, in turn, on Article 21(1) of the ICJ Statute. Rule 15 provides for the election of five officers: a Chairperson, three Vice-Chairpersons and a Rapporteur.¹⁸

14 According to Article 18(1), the Committee shall elect its officers for a term of four years. Chapter IV (Rules 16 to 21) is entitled ‘Officers’ but does not really define the term. Since the RoP have been amended several times, it is no longer clear who the officers of the Committee are and what their respective functions are called. Rule 16 provides, similar to other RoP of human rights treaty bodies, that the ‘Committee shall elect from among its members a Chairperson, three Vice-Chairperson and a Rapporteur’. But Rule 17 refers ‘Chairperson, members of the Bureau and Rapporteurs’.¹⁹ This gives the impression that there are more than the five officers indicated in Rule 16.

15 The term ‘Bureau’ is nowhere defined but usually the five officers together constitute the Bureau. For a Committee of only ten members, a Bureau of five members seems to be excessive. In larger bodies, such as the Human Rights Council, a Bureau of five members serves the purpose of equitable geographic distribution among the five regional groups of the UN system. The Committee does its best to ensure an equal distribution, but this would require in the present composition that the single members from Asia and Africa must always be elected officers.

16 Having clarified that the Bureau consists of the Chairperson, three Vice-Chairpersons and one Rapporteur, the question remains why Rules 12 and 16 speak of ‘Rapporteurs’ in plural. It seems that the Committee mixed up the Rapporteur of the Committee (the member responsible for the annual report to the General Assembly) with other ‘Rapporteurs’ who, according to Rule 61(3), may be appointed by the Committee to perform such duties as mandated by the Committee, eg Country Rapporteurs, the Rapporteurs on Follow-up and the Rapporteurs on reprisals. Are such Rapporteurs also officers to be elected for a term of two years in accordance with Article 18(1), as suggested by Rule 16? Since Rule 61(3) uses the term ‘appoint’ rather than ‘elect’, it is believed that the plural of ‘Rapporteurs’ in Rules 12 and 16 is simply a mistake, that only the five persons mentioned in Rule 15 are to be considered as officers (together as Bureau) to be elected in accordance with Article 18(1), and that other Rapporteurs and similar subsidiary bodies may also be appointed for a shorter term of office, such as one year.²⁰

17 Rules 11 to 14 determine election procedures, beginning of term of office, the filling of vacancies and the solemn declaration of members of the Committee. These five officers of the Committee are elected for a term of two years and may be re-elected (Rule

¹⁸ Since 2010, the RoP contained both the terms ‘Chairpersons’ and ‘Chairmen’. This was however corrected in 2013 see CAT, ‘Rules of Procedure, as Lastly Amended by the Committee at Its Fiftieth Sessions (06 May 2013–31 May 2013)’ (2014) UN Doc CAT/C/3/Rev.6, which now refers only to the gender neutral term of ‘Chairperson’.

¹⁹ Emphasis added.

²⁰ This uncertainty has persisted over the years, as in its annual reports the Committee has sometimes included the issue of the designation of the various rapporteurs under Article 61 under the heading ‘Election of officers’ but referring to the ‘designation’ of the rapporteurs (eg CAT, ‘Report of the Committee Against Torture Fifty-first Session (28 October–22 November 2013) Fifty-second Session (28 April–23 May 2014)’ (2014) UN Doc A/69/44, para 10); and sometimes referred to the elections of the officers including also the rapporteurs (eg CAT, ‘Report of the Committee Against Torture Fifty-fifth Session (27 July–14 August 2015) Fifty-sixth Session (9 November–9 December 2015) Fifty-seventh Session (18 April–13 May 2016)’ (2016) UN Doc A/71/44 19, Annex XI).

17). If any of the officers is unable to continue serving in his or her position, a new officer is elected for the unexpired term of his or her predecessor (Rule 21). As of the forty-fifth session in 2010, the RoP explicitly provide that in electing its officers the Committee 'shall give consideration to equitable geographical distribution and appropriate gender balance and, to the extent possible, rotation among members'.²¹

18 Rule 61(1) permits the Committee to establish ad hoc subsidiary bodies, such as working groups, and define their composition and mandate as it deems necessary. The subsidiary body shall elect its own officers and adopt its own RoP. Failing such, the Committee's RoP are to apply. In addition, Rule 61(3) sets out the possibility for the Committee to generally appoint one or more of its members as 'Rapporteurs' with mandates to perform special duties.²²

19 With regard to the individual complaint procedure, Rule 112 further specifies that the Committee may establish a working group for the purpose of deciding on the admissibility and making recommendations on the merits of the complaint or otherwise assisting the Committee. The members of the working group should be no less than three and no more than five. The working group can also designate Special rapporteurs for specific complaints.²³ Moreover, since 2002 the Committee has established a Pre-sessional working group of three to five members to assist the plenary in its work under Article 22, a Rapporteur for new complaints and interim measures; a Rapporteur for follow-up on decisions adopted under Article 22 (Rule 120); and a Rapporteur on reprisals under Article 22.²⁴ The Pre-sessional working group seems to be no longer in place as of 2005.²⁵

20 Similar functions were created in the framework of the reporting procedure under Article 19, namely a Country Rapporteur and alternate Rapporteurs, a Rapporteur for follow up to concluding observations (Rule 72), and a Rapporteur on reprisals under Article 19;²⁶ and the inquiry procedure under Article 20, namely a Rapporteur for follow up under Article 20 (which is exercised jointly by the Rapporteur for follow up under Article 22); and a Rapporteur on reprisals under Article 20.²⁷

21 Strictly speaking, with the entry into force of the OPCAT in 2006, another subsidiary body, the SPT, was established.²⁸ As the OPCAT was established with a view to complement and reinforce the provisions of the Convention, the two treaties set up various ways in which the CAT Committee and the SPT interrelate. First and foremost, Article

See also below Art 19, §§ 55, 79–80, 107.

²⁷ The Rapporteur for follow-up under Article 20 was established at the thirty-first session in 2003 see CAT, 'Report of the Committee against Torture Thirty-first Session (10–21 November 2003) Thirty-second Session (3–21 May 2004)' (2004) UN Doc A/59/44, para 15. ²⁸ See below Arts 6 and 7 OP.

10(3) OPCAT and Rule 62 CAT provide that the CAT Committee shall meet with the SPT at least once a year, during the regular session they both hold simultaneously in November. They have also decided to set up an informal contact group to strengthen their cooperation.²⁹ Secondly, Article 16(3) OPCAT and Rule 63 CAT oblige the SPT to submit its annual report to the CAT Committee, who references it in its own annual report to the States parties and the GA. Finally, under Article 16(4) OPCAT if a State party refuses to cooperate with the SPT, the CAT Committee may, at the request of the SPT, decide to make a public statement or to publish the report of the SPT.³⁰ In practice, however, the SPT has developed in a fairly autonomous way with its own RoP³¹ and has presented itself as ‘a brother committee’ rather than a ‘sub-committee’.³²

3.3 Voting (Article 18(2))

22 While Article 18(2)(a) provides that the quorum should be constituted by six members, Article 18(2)(b) establishes that ‘[d]ecisions of the Committee shall be made by a majority vote of the members present’. If the vote is equally divided, then the matter—with the exception of elections—is regarded as rejected (Rule 51).

23 But the CAT Committee decided, since its first session in April 1988, to follow the practice of the HRC to expressly include in its RoP that Committee members should try to reach decisions by consensus before voting, provided that such attempts did not unduly delay the work of the Committee. However, at the request of any member or the Chairperson, the proposal can be put to vote.³³ Towards the outside world, the Committee, as with other human rights treaty bodies, pretends that its decisions are adopted by consensus, and some commentators maintain that ‘no vote has been taken to date’. Although the adoption of general comments, concluding observations by consensus might enhance the authority of the Committee’s decisions and opinions, one should not forget that the consensus rule dates from the Cold War and reflects the fears of the former members from Socialist States of being overruled by others. In practice, the Committee applies the consensus rule in a fairly flexible manner. Since elections are held by secret ballot pursuant to Rule 58, the consensus principle cannot be applied. Moreover, in the individual complaints procedure, the Committee allows for individual (concurring or dissenting) opinions in order to provide members with the opportunity to express their

²⁹ CAT, ‘Working Methods’ XIII. ³⁰ See also below Art 16 OP.

³¹ The CAT Committee’s RoP contain only a brief reference to the work of the SPT, which has the power to adopt its own RoP under Article 10 OP. In contrast the RoP of other human rights treaties bodies (eg CEDAW and CESCR) contain sections regulating their OPs see also HRI/MC/2013/2 (n 17) para 7.

³² See Rachel Murray and others, The Optional Protocol to the UN Convention against Torture (Oxford University Press 2011) 139. See also below Art 11 OP.

³³ The reference to consensus in decision making had been initially (at the first session) incorporated in the RoP with the addition of a footnote to Rule 50 (A/43/46 (n 11) Annex III; CAT/C/SR.2, para 68); however, at its forty-fifth session such reference has been included directly in the text of Rule 50 with the addition two new paragraphs: see Rules 50(2) and (3) as modified at its forty-fifth in CAT/C/3/Rev.5 and then confirmed in the amendments of the fiftieth session in CAT/C/3/Rev.6. See also Rule 51 in the RoP of the HRC and its footnote (CCPR/C/3/Rev.10). On certain absurd consequences of maintaining the principle of consensus even in decisions on individual complaints with dissenting opinions see Manfred Nowak, UN Covenant on Civil and Political Rights: CCPR Commentary (2nd edn, NP Engel 2005) 708ff; and Chris Ingelse, United Nations Committee Against Torture: An Assessment (Martinus Nijhoff 2001) 106, who maintains that the CAT Committee has taken its decisions by consensus notwithstanding certain decisions on individual complaints which contain dissenting opinions.

disagreement. It would be strange to maintain that a decision with a dissenting opinion attached was adopted by consensus.
